
THE TEACHING OF READING

A MANUAL

TO ACCOMPANY

EVERYDAY CLASSICS

Fifth and Sixth Readers

BY

FRANKLIN T. BAKER

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH IN TEACHERS COLLEGE AND SUPERVISOR OF ENGLISH IN THE
HORACE MANN SCHOOL

AND

ASHLEY H. THORNDIKE

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH IN COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

New York
THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
1920

All rights reserved

588602

C
COPYRIGHT, 1917,
BY THE MACMILLAN COMPANY.

Set up and electrotyped. Published April, 1917.

Norwood Press
J. S. Cushing Co. — Berwick & Smith Co.
Norwood, Mass., U.S.A.

FIFTH READER

The FIFTH READER is primarily a story-book. The THIRD READER has introduced the child to folk and fairy myth and legend, and the FOURTH READER has given prominence to out-of-door life and nature study; now the FIFTH READER offers a notable collection of the best stories for boys and girls in both prose and verse.

With such a collection, the first objects in teaching are to make sure that the children understand the stories and that they can read them intelligently. The Helps to Study in the Reader itself provide sufficient information to remove the difficulties and enable the child to come to the story with interest. They also offer questions on the content of the selections. Their purpose is always to make sure that the child gets at the heart of the story. That surely is the essential thing, yet we all know how often it is missed in our reading lessons.

What is the story about? Who are the persons? Is there a hero or heroine? When did it take place? Has it any moral or lesson? Can you put the gist of the story into a sentence or two? These are the questions to which the teacher herself should have answers and with which she should make sure that the story lives for the class. Not every story is of great importance, but it has some meaning; and it is this meaning to which both textbook and teacher should guide the child.

Many of the stories in the Reader are stories of action, of heroic deed or adventure. Some of the great deeds of history and legend are celebrated, as the Landing of the Pilgrims, the Siege of Leyden, and the Expedition for the Golden Fleece. Some of the heroes of stirring deeds appear, as Robin Hood, Robinson Crusoe, Arnold of Winkelried, William Tell, and Paul Revere. There is an opportunity to make these stories, once they are clearly understood, enforce lessons, point out essential virtues, and interest the children in ideals of conduct.

In connection with this purpose, one section of the Reader is given to great men and women, as General Grant, General Lee, and Joan of Arc. Moreover, attention to nobility of conduct is not aroused merely through the great men and women of history and fiction. There are stories of brave and kindly children: — of Tom Brown in the football match, of John Halifax, who, though only a vagabond boy was yet a gentleman, and of children who celebrated Christmas in the real Christmas spirit of sacrifice. And there are stories of heroic animals, of the dog who saved his master, and the horse that brought the good news to Aix.

One word about the moral in these stories. Sometimes there isn't any, as in a story of wonder like "Aladdin and his Lamp." When there is a moral it is always a simple one. If the child understands the story, he can scarcely miss the lesson. The teacher may help to make it plain and to drive it home. But a great deal of sermonizing is unnecessary.

Order of the Selections

Not all the selections are stories and not all the stories deal with heroism and adventure. The selections are arranged in groups according to the nature of the contents.

I. School Days.
II. Heroism and Adventure.
III. Battle and Bravery.
IV. Great Men and Great Women.
V. Animals.
VI. Home and Country.
VII. Boys and Girls.
VIII. Two Christmases.
IX. Wonder and Enchantment.

In general this seems an interesting arrangement for the average class, and it permits of careful grading, the longer and more difficult stories coming in the second half of the book.

Every teacher, however, should feel free to change the order to suit the special needs of her class. Group I on School Days, might, for example, be postponed until after Group II, on Heroism and Adventure. Or, after the children have read several of the selections in Group I, the longer stories, the "Last Lesson" and "Football at Rugby," might be omitted until later. The two Christmas Stories in Group VIII are interesting to read together, but they are also interesting to read separately, in connection with other stories. The teacher will find it easy to change the order to suit special occasions or needs.

The selections in this volume, as in the others in the series, are all well-known classics. Some of them have been told to many generations of children, all have a place in the permanent literature of our race. Because the story is old, however, is no sign that it is well known to the child. The purpose of the book is to bring the child into a knowledge and appreciation of the stories that his parents have known before him and that he in turn may later enjoy with his children. In this book, literature should be performing for children its great task of socializing sentiment and feeling. The child is being introduced to the heritage of the race.

In later Readers in this series more attention may well be paid to special literary values and appreciations. In this book, little attention should be directed to particular merits of style, or characteristics of the author; but the main concern should be to introduce the child to a story which the teacher knows to be a classic. Because it is old, well known, because it was read by her as a child, is precisely why the teacher should be well prepared to make the child feel its interest and enjoy the deeds and sentiments that have already stirred many thousands of children.

Literary Study and Biography

Certain phases of literary study, however, should not be neglected. Many of the selections are poems, and attention should be paid to reading verse aloud. Nothing is more necessary for the right appreciation of poetry than the habit of reading verse and hearing it read with attention both to sense and to meter. In the notes for teachers which follow, especial attention is paid to the correct reading and appreciation both of the short poem and also of the long narrative poem, as the "Pied Piper." Again, in a book representing so many famous authors, it is desirable that the children learn something of their lives and work. The amount of this kind of study can be determined by the teacher. The Notes supply or suggest material for all the authors. But the teacher will do well to limit her efforts to a few. Goldsmith, Dickens, Scott, Defoe, Tennyson, Browning, Ruskin, George Eliot, and Shakespeare are some of the best-known English authors included; and Hawthorne, Eggleston, Longfellow, Lowell, and Bryant are the best known of the Americans. It is much better, however, that the child really become interested in the lives and work of three or four of these, than for him to get a smattering of information about all of them.

In the Reader itself, the lives of only a few authors have been treated at length. Goldsmith, Scott, Ruskin, Browning, Hawthorne, Bryant, and Shakespeare are those who have received special attention. Many of the other authors are treated in other books in this Series, and material for all the authors is supplied in the Manual.

Helps to Study

The Helps to Study after each selection in the Reader contain nothing which is not addressed to the pupil. They usually consist of three parts.

I. Introductory Matter. This gives biographical, historical, and other information necessary to introduce the child to the selection. In some cases this material precedes, and in some cases it follows the selection, forming the first paragraph under the Helps to Study. Both the arrangement and the matter itself are determined by the nature of the selection. In the case of an extract from a long historical narrative, as the "Siege of Leyden," some introductory comment is desirable before the child begins to read. In the case of a poem whose opening lines command attention, as the "Hunting Song," it seems best to give the child the poem first, and the historical information afterwards. The nature of the introductory matter naturally varies with each selection. Its purpose is not to give elaborate biographical or literary comment but to find the best way of aiding the pupil's interest and appreciation.

II. Questions. (1) These questions are in part on the contents of the selection. They test the pupil's knowledge of what he has read, and guide him in the right interpretation. The teacher should make sure that the class use these questions in studying the lessons, and should often call for answers in the classroom. There is, however, a danger of making questions and answers more important than intelligent and distinct reading. The teacher will often put stress on expressive reading rather than on questions on the content.

(2) Other questions are on the application of the selection to the child's experience or reading. Such questions are sometimes grouped in a second paragraph. They are not intended to be exhaustive but to be suggestive for further discussion in the class.

(3) Occasionally such questions are grouped as Review Questions, recalling the connection of the selection with preceding selections, or applying its moral in the light of earlier reading.

(4) Many of the questions deal with details of word, phrase, figure of speech, or meter. In the FIFTH READER, however, this detailed study of the text is never emphasized at the expense of the interest in the selection as a whole. Further study of words and phrases is provided under the heading: —

III. For Study with the Glossary. This includes lists of difficult words and phrases. In case of unusual, obsolete, or foreign words, the definition and pronunciation are given. But usually the pupil is referred to the GLOSSARY. By the time the pupil has reached the FIFTH READER, the reading lesson should not be mainly a drill on vocabulary. The pupil should begin to use the dictionary freely; and as a convenient substitute for a dictionary, the GLOSSARY at the end of the book is offered. There the pronunciation of each word is indicated, the diacritical marks of Webster's dictionary being used. The words are also carefully defined.

Drill on Words and Phrases

How shall the words and phrases "For Study with the Glossary" be treated by the teacher? Manifestly, the class will need a good deal of guidance and testing before they can be trusted to use the Glossary with intelligence and security.

First of all, there should be exercises on How to use the Glossary. The pupils should look up the words in the classroom, and the teacher should test their results. During the early weeks of the school-year, these exercises should be frequent.

After a fair efficiency in using the Glossary has been acquired, the classroom use of the lists of words and phrases may be considerably varied. Speaking broadly, however, there are two main methods.

1. Preparatory Study of Words and Phrases. By this method the teacher will call attention to the words "For Study with the Glossary," on the day before the selection is read. In assigning the lesson for study, a few minutes will be taken to run over the list of difficult words; the teacher herself giving the correct pronunciations. This preparatory drill is of more importance for pronunciation than for definition and is indispensable with selections containing many foreign or difficult names.

2. Supplementary Study of Words and Phrases. After the selection has been read in the class, notice may be taken of any words that give difficulty in meaning or grammar. The work of the class with the Glossary can be tested and the discussion utilized in the better interpretation of the selection.

The two methods can often be combined, but undoubtedly for the Fifth Reader the preparatory method must frequently be employed. However, it will be found that many of the selections offer little difficulty in words and phrases, and can be read without preliminary drill. This is particularly true of some of the longer selections in the later part of the book, as the "King of the Golden River."

The lists under "For Study with the Glossary" serve not only as a guide to the pupils but as a convenient indication to the teacher as to method of treatment.

A word may be added as to pronunciation and definition. Pronunciation is better taught by example than by precept. If the teacher is careful in maintaining clear and correct pronunciation in the reading and discussion, there will be little need for special drill.

Definitions are of little value in fixing the meaning of words. The way to know a word is to use it. The employment of new words in oral and written exercises as well as in the reading lessons, is the best way to strengthen the pupil's vocabulary.

General Method

With many variations, the methods of using the Reader will follow this general outline.

1. Assignment of Selection, with brief talk on the subject of the selection or on new words and phrases.
2. Preparation by pupils at their desks or at home of the lesson, with the aid of the Helps to Study and of the Glossary.
3. Classroom discussion of the selection, and test of the pupil's preparation. Reading aloud, with careful attention to pronunciation, enunciation, and expression.
4. Further work will be determined by the nature of the selection. There may be further intensive study of words and expressions, or a rapid re-reading, or a continued discussion of matters raised by the reading and study.

The Helps to Study with the Glossary provide all that the class will need for its guidance. This Manual offers supplementary suggestions on each selection. They are not to be used in any cut-and-dried fashion, but may be of service in adding to the pleasure or information of the pupils or in encouraging further reading. They may also help the teacher in answering for herself the question, "Why is this a classic?"

NOTES ON THE SELECTIONS

I. SCHOOL DAYS

The book opens with a group of selections telling of schools of various times and countries. These selections may be used to encourage an interest on the part of the children in their school. It may be compared with the schools described and its advantage over them indicated. Something of the improvements that modern schools have secured over those of past times may be suggested by the first four selections. The service of the school to the nation is shown by the "Last Lesson" of Daudet, and the moral value of school athletics appears in "Football at Rugby." The schools in the selections all belong to past times, but they can be made real and vivid by comparison with the present.

If the teacher prefers, this group may well be divided, and the last two selections reserved for later reading.

An Old-Fashioned School, by Nathaniel Hawthorne (11)

This is not a story, but a description. The important lesson is that the children should see clearly the things described: the schoolroom, the schoolmaster, the classes of boys. Since the description is of an old-time school, its differences from a school of to-day should be made plain. These differences are to be seen in the room, in the dress of the master and boys, in the lessons recited, and in the punishments.

The selection contains some difficult phrases. "His Majesty's Council" must be explained as referring to the time when the King of England was also king of this country. "Generations of schoolboys" is another phrase which the imagination of a child will scarcely seize without a little explanation. As parents belong to one generation, children to another, and their children to a third, so the old schoolmaster has seen one class of boys grow to manhood, followed by another and another, like so many generations. And the teacher may well make sure what the children understand by Latin.

Attention may also be called to the fact that there are no girls in Master Cheever's school. Girls and the smaller boys in Colonial days went to dame schools, taught by women, where they learned reading and writing. Has any pupil ever seen a sampler such as the girls made at the dame schools?

Nathaniel Hawthorne's life is treated in connection with the "Pine Tree Shillings" on p. 75 of the Reader. The opening pages of his Grandfather's Chair might be read aloud to the class if time permits. Other selections from that volume are to be found on pp. 69–88 of the Reader.

Topics for Oral or Written Composition. Master Cheever's Schoolroom. Our Schoolroom. Our Class in Reading. Master Cheever.

The Village Schoolmaster, by Oliver Goldsmith (17)

This famous passage from Goldsmith's "Deserted Village" describes another schoolmaster who may be compared with Master Ezekiel Cheever. It is written in couplets, two rhyming lines, and should be read aloud with a marked pause at the end of each couplet. And the teacher should make sure that the pupil understands each couplet by itself.

Note that the last and best-known couplet sums up the whole description.

The village schoolmaster is described as seen by his pupils and the villagers; so his importance is exaggerated with a kindly humor. This mock exaggeration extends to the language. His schoolroom is a "noisy mansion," the bad boys are "boding tremblers," the farmers are "gazing rustics," and large words from the schoolmaster have a "thundering sound." Do the children get the humor of the description? Can they pick out any other of the humorous exaggerations?

An account of Oliver Goldsmith is given on p. 219 in connection with the selection "Moses Goes to the Fair." Another well-known description of a schoolmaster is Cecil Alexander's poem, the "Jolly Old Pedagogue."

Squeers's School, by Charles Dickens (19)

The description of Squeers's school furnishes an example of a bad teacher, but it may be read with stress mainly on the humor. The children should see the absurdity of a teacher who makes mistakes in spelling and grammar and who thinks that "quadruped" is Latin. Attention must also be called to the genuinely practical mode of teaching as shown in manual training or cooking classes. "Philosophy" seems to be used by Squeers in its old sense of natural philosophy, or science. The class should know the correct spelling of botany, and should pronounce the adjective learnèd in "his learned eye" (p. 19, l. 4).

An account of Charles Dickens and the story of David Copperfield's experience at school are given in the SIXTH Reader. If time permits, the teacher might read aloud from Nicholas Nickleby selections about the school in Chapters VII and VIII, or the account of Nickleby's revolt against Squeers in Chapter XIII.

Topics for Oral or Written Composition. The Three Schoolmasters: Ezekiel Cheever. The Wonder of the Village, Squeers. Practical Education To-day. "What Is the Use of Having Grammars at All?"

The New Teacher, by Edward Eggleston (21)

This is a story of a successful teacher who taught a lesson to a bad boy. In contrast to the preceding selection it shows a school conducted on right principles. It is also interesting as giving a picture of an ungraded rural school such as was common in this country for many years and such as exists in many places to-day. If yours is a city school the children should be told of the condition of schools in the country. If yours is a country school, stress may be put on the services of a country school for its district.

The Hoosier Schoolmaster is perhaps the best novel by Edward Eggleston (1837–1902) and it may be considered an American classic because of the picture which it presents of life in Indiana, when that state was still the frontier. Other novels by Eggleston are the Circuit Rider, Roxy, and the Hoosier Schoolboy.

Topics for Oral or Written Composition. Compare Mr. Squeers and Mr. Williams. The Little Red Schoolhouse. An Incident in My School. Why I Should Learn Good Manners. How Did Riley Feel?

The Last Lesson, by Alphonse Daudet (26)

This beautiful story is told throughout strictly from a child's point of view. Every incident, every detail is as a little boy would see it and feel about it. The class should be able to follow the story without difficulty. But its full meaning perhaps lies beyond the sense of any child. The pathos of the loss of country and language cannot readily be felt by those who have not experienced it; but the story suggests even to children what is meant by love of country and of the mother tongue. What the master said of the French language may be applied to our own, and the thoughts of little Franz may well be those of every child as he surmounts the difficulties of verbs and grammar.

Alphonse Daudet (Dō dā′), (1840–1897), was a noted French novelist and humorist. His Tartarin of Tarascon, a bragging humbug, is one of the famous humorous characters in fiction.

After the class has read and understood the story, they might analyze it: — 1. On the way to school. 2. Arrival at school. 3. The teacher's announcement. 4. The lessons. 5. The close of school.

Cuore by Edouardo de Amicis is a story telling of an Italian boy's experience at school.

Football at Rugby, by Thomas Hughes (31)

The selection tells of a boy's first day at school, of the football game which he saw, and of the brave part that he played in it. The game is between the 'schoolhouse' with its few boys and the 'school' composed of all the other houses, but the schoolhouse wins because every boy does his best, and Tom Brown catches some of this spirit.

Rugby is a famous school and football is a famous game; so there are many things in this selection to talk about. The best account of Rugby is to be found in Tom Brown's School Days (Macmillan's Pocket Classics). "Arthur's First Day" is especially suitable for reading in class, and indicates Dr. Arnold's great work there as master. The teacher will recall both the tribute paid to him in Tom Brown at Oxford and that by his son Matthew Arnold in "Rugby Chapel."

As for football, the boys will be able to see the difference between the game then and now. It will interest them to know that the modern American college game is a development from this old game at Rugby. The method of kicking the goal is still the same, but many other details have changed. As this is a long selection, some care should be taken that pupils see the order of events. It is divided in two parts, but may be treated as a single lesson if the teacher prefers.

Thomas Hughes (1822–1896) was himself a schoolboy at Rugby, and both as a writer and a social reformer carried on the lessons he learnt there from Dr. Arnold.

II. HEROISM AND ADVENTURE

The selections in this group deal with some of the most stirring chapters in the world story of adventure. It will be noticed that the second, third, and fourth selections have to do with Robin Hood; the next three with stories of America. The selections from Robinson Crusoe and Swiss Family Robinson go together; and the stories of Arnold Winkelried and William Tell form a final group. Each of these small groups should be read together; but any one of them might be postponed if this suits the teacher's special plans.

Hunting Song, by Walter Scott (40)

There are several ways in which this song may be given its full significance. First, it offers an excellent exercise in reading aloud. It should be read with spirit and with emphasis on the accents and rhymes of the verse. No harm is done if the children overemphasize these metrical aspects. Second, it offers an introduction to the stories of adventure and heroism which are to follow, and was written by the prince of all romancers. The last stanza indeed expresses the creed of all light-hearted adventure, Carpe diem, or, make the most of time which is flying. This is the moral of much recent literature which enforces joyful and cheerful living, as the writings of David Grayson and others. Third, the poem is directly related to the stories of Robin Hood and the greenwood which follow. It must be recognized, however, that the hunting scene described is outside of the experience of American children. What they may know about hunting has little to do with hawks, or stags, or foresters, or ladies gay. The scene belongs to past times and indeed to the world of romance. But the poem reanimates this world for us.

An account of Walter Scott will be found on p. 61 in connection with the selection from Ivanhoe.

Robin Hood Rescues the Woman's Three Sons (43)

The ballad is a form of poetry admirably suited to children, but unfortunately the subject matter of many of the old popular ballads needs a good deal of explanation for the children of to-day. Nothing could be better reading, however, for boys and girls than this ballad of Robin Hood. The following suggestions indicate the way one teacher introduced the ballad to her class.

1. She asked the class what they knew about Robin Hood. Some said they had never heard of him. Others had read the selections in the Reader. Several had heard various stories of his life in the forest. As a result of this talk, all came to know that he was the head of a band of outlaws living in the woods many years ago, hated by the rich Normans whom they robbed, and loved by the poor Saxons whom they protected.

2. What sort of stories did the poor people who loved Robin Hood tell about him? These poor people could not read or write. How were their stories preserved? Some clever person put the story into rhyme, and sang it. Others repeated it by song or recitation, and perhaps added a little to it. The people liked to gather together and hear the brave deeds of their hero celebrated. Parents sang those stories to children, and the children remembered them and sang them to their children. The poems about Robin Hood were thus kept alive for hundreds of years before they were ever printed. Many other stories were sung by the people and handed down from generation to generation; but of all these ballads, the best known are those of Robin Hood.

3. Now let us read the ballad. Imagine you are reciting to the people the story of their hero.

The following old ballads will interest boys and girls: "Robin Hood's Death and Burial," "The Gay Gos-hawk,"

"The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington," "King John and the Abbot of Canterbury." They may be found in Gummere's Old Ballads (Ginn) or the one volume selections from Child's Ballads (Houghton).

Robin Hood and Little John, by Thomas Bulfinch (50)

This selection records another adventure of Robin Hood in a modern version. Bulfinch's Legends of King Arthur is also published as the Age of Chivalry.

The Archery Contest, by Sir Walter Scott (54)

This is another adventure of Robin Hood told by a great master of fiction. The lesson may be made the occasion of telling the class something about Ivanhoe. It will be perhaps some years before they will read this great novel with enjoyment, but they might learn something of its scenes and persons, of the England of Saxon and Norman, of the knights, tournaments, and castles of the age of chivalry, and of Richard I, the Lion-hearted, the hero of many battles and many a story. The FIFTH READER affords an opportunity to call the attention of the class to several of the best English novels which the boys and girls should look forward to reading: Ivanhoe, Robinson Crusoe, the Vicar of Wakefield, and John Halifax. Maurice Hewlett's Richard Yea and Nay is a modern novel dealing with Richard I.

This selection lends itself readily to dramatization. The class could aid in arranging the action and in adding to the dialogue.

The account of Scott given in the Reader may also be supplemented with other incidents of his most interesting life. Whatever the class now learns about him should be occasionally recalled and made the basis of further information as other selections from his writing are read. The standard biography of Scott is by his son-in-law Lockhart, and is one of the great biographies of the language. A good short life is by R. H. Hutton in the " English Men of Letters Series." S. R. Crockett's Red Cap Tales from Scott's novels are excellent for younger readers.

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. Robin Hood. England in Robin Hood's Time. Richard, the Lion-hearted. Robin Hood's Companions. How Ballads Were Made.

The Wreck of the Hesperus, by Longfellow (64)

This selection and the two following have their location in America, and are quite different in character from the preceding adventures in Sherwood forest. The " Wreck of the Hesperus " is written in ballad stanzas and is an admirable imitation of the old ballads, of which we had an example in " Robin Hood Rescues the Widow's Three Sons." Like them, it is marked by the directness and dramatic quality of the narrative. The narrative is broken at different times by three speakers, the old sailor, the captain, and the daughter. The reading by the class should be as spirited as possible; perhaps after a first reading, the general narrative might be assigned to one reader, the lines of the speakers to three pupils, and the poem read dramatically.

What do your children know of the sea and of ships? Do they understand what a schooner is? What it is to weather a storm? Why the captain steered for the open sea?

An account of Longfellow is given in the FOURTH READER. The standard biography is the Life by Samuel Longfellow. There is a good short life by Colonel Higginson in the American Men of Letters series, and an interesting paper in Howells' My Literary Friends and Acquaintances.

The Pine Tree Shillings, by Nathaniel Hawthorne (69)

Following the tragic story of the Hesperus, we have a humorous account of Colonial days. This selection should be read rapidly in the class, and scarcely requires intensive treatment. There are enough references in the selection to dress, food, and manners of the New England colonists to suggest further discussion. Hawthorne's Grandfather's Chair, from which this and the following selection are taken, is the best account of Colonial days for children. The teacher should know his Twice-Told Tales and Scarlet Letter. The teacher will be interested in Alice Morse's Child Life in Colonial Days, and her Home Life in Colonial Days (The Macmillan Standard Library).

The Sunken Treasure, by Nathaniel Hawthorne (77)

This selection deals with one of the great themes of adventure, the search for treasure. It tells a true story that touches on two great historical epochs of adventure and heroism. First, there is the epoch of the Spanish conquest of America, and of the great stores of gold and silver borne back to Spain by the loaded galleons. Second, there is the epoch of the English colonies in America, of daring seamen and traders who pushed their little vessels into every port of the western seas. The story of the Spanish conquest includes the many voyages of discovery by Columbus, Balboa, and others, the conquest of Mexico by Cortez, and of Peru by Pizarro. The class should know something about some of these. The teacher may tell, too, of Spanish America at its time of glory, and of the great stores of precious metals and spices collected and shipped back to Spain; of the busy traffic on the Isthmus of Panama, and how the gold and silver of South America were brought to Panama, the oldest settlement by Europeans on the mainland of America, and then sent across the Isthmus to the Atlantic. Soon there arose the great struggle between England and Spain that culminated with the destruction of the Spanish Armada. Chief among the Englishmen who robbed the Spanish settlements and treasure ships were Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins, hero of the famous sea fight sung by Tennyson in the "Revenge." Panama itself was unsuccessfully attacked by Drake; and later, when Phipps was a young man of twenty, was sacked and destroyed by the pirate Morgan.

Far different, but scarcely less adventurous, was the early history of the English colonies in America. The lives of Sir Walter Raleigh, Captain John Smith, and many others had the same qualities of persistence, courage, and enterprise that we find in the career of Sir William Phipps.

The amount of historic material is so great that there is a danger of trying to bring too much of it before the class. In a case of this sort, it is a good plan first, to discover how much or how little the children already know of the historic background; second, to make clear a very simple outline, as here, e.g., (1) the Spanish discovery and settlement, (2) the Spanish treasure ships, (3) the New England colonies; third, to recall or retell one or two stories connected with that of the selection, e.g., of Cortez, of Captain John Smith, of Sir Francis Drake.

At any rate, care should be taken that the children understand some of the difficulties that beset the sailors of those times — the smallness of the ships, the danger of storm, fever, and mutiny. The moral is evident, the value of courage and persistency.

Topics for Oral or Written Composition. The Early Life of Phipps. His Unsuccessful Attempts to Find Treasure. Finding the Treasure. Where the Treasure Came From.

The best-known story of a hunt for treasure is Stevenson's Treasure Island. The class will enjoy Frank Stockton's Stories of the Spanish Main (Macmillan).

The Day after the Shipwreck, by Defoe (89)

Though this selection from Robinson Crusoe, and those which follow, take us from New England, we still have to do with adventures by sea. Robinson Crusoe is a book that every child should read, but it may be a question whether it should be read by pupils of this class or later. Another selection is given in the SIXTH READER, with an accompanying description of the island of Juan de Fernandez from Dana's Two Years before the Mast. Something of the story can be told to the class at this time, or some other selections read to them.

One great attraction of Robinson Crusoe is the abundance of precise details. Take any paragraph in this selection and note the number of incidents, objects, or details of some sort that are enumerated. The selection is particularly suited to testing of the children's ability to remember the contents of their reading.

DANIEL DEFOE (1661–1731) was a most voluminous writer of novels, essays, pamphlets, and poems, but his fame may well rest on Robinson Crusoe. There is a good account of his extraordinary life by W. Minto in the English Men of Letters series; another by W. P. Trent (Bobbs, Merrill).

A Shipwrecked Family, by Johann David Wyss (96)

The Swiss Family Robinson is the best known of the many stories written in imitation of Robinson Crusoe. It was written in 1813 by Johann Wyss, a Swiss professor.

Arnold of Winkelried, by James Montgomery (103)

This poem by a Scottish poet (1776–1854) records a stirring piece of valor which makes a fitting companion for the following story of William Tell.

William Tell, by Sheridan Knowles (107)

Like Robin Hood and Robinson Crusoe, William Tell is one of the great heroes of story, but his fame rests almost on a single incident, that here recorded in the play by Sheridan Knowles. He is also the subject of the more famous German play, Wilhelm Tell, by Schiller.

In dramatic pieces, it is well to read the selection first to make sure of the meaning and pronunciation, and then to arrange for a somewhat formal dramatic rendering. Let the pupils who have been assigned parts take their places on the platform or in the front of the room, and encourage both clear enunciation and spirited expression.

The extent to which drama may be introduced into the reading class must be left to the teacher's judgment. "Robin Hood and the Widow's Three Sons" and the "Archery Contest" from Ivanhoe could readily be arranged for dramatic recitation. Undoubtedly occasional dramatic renderings help to give interest and vigor to the reading lesson.

Topics for discussion in the class are (1) Switzerland, and (2) other brave deeds for country and liberty.

III. BATTLE AND BRAVERY

War is one of the great themes of literature as it has been one of the great occupations of mankind. These selections celebrate bravery and the many other heroic virtues that arise in charge or siege. Taken together the four selections afford a variegated picture of both the horrors and virtues of battle; and the last selection, the "Battle of Blenheim," offers a searching comment on the wastefulness and uselessness of war which cannot fail to reach the imagination of the pupil. If the teacher prefers, however, these selections can be distributed through the book.

Hohenlinden, by Thomas Campbell (119)

A poem that is justly famous because of the vividness of its description of the battle. The poem is an excellent one for reading aloud. Note that at the end of the first and second lines of each stanza, there is a pause in sense as well as meter. In the third line, however, the sense runs on into the fourth. Only a slight pause is needed at the end of the third line of each stanza.

Some of the best-known short poems by THOMAS CAMPBELL (1777–1844) are "The Soldier's Dream," "Ye Mariners of England," and "Lord Ullin's Daughter." "Gertrude of Wyoming," one of his longer poems, deals with incidents in our Revolutionary War.

The Charge of the Light Brigade, by Tennyson (122)

The class should be made to read this poem with as much expression as possible. It is too much to expect them to render adequately Tennyson's magnificent lines, but it will interest and help them to perceive that the first two lines imitate the galloping of the horses, that the lines at the beginning of the second and third stanzas suggest the thunder of the guns, and that the rapid short lines throughout harmonize with the rapid movement of the charge. It was in the Crimean War that Florence Nightingale served as nurse to the wounded soldiers.

An account of Tennyson's life is given in the SIXTH READER.

The Siege of Leyden, by John Lothrop Motley (125)

The introductory note in the Reader states the historic circumstances of the siege, but the opportunity may be taken for a class talk on picturesque Holland, and on its great achievements in commerce and art as well as in war.

This selection offers a little difficulty in the pronunciation of the foreign proper names. It must be confessed that there is a good deal of inconsistency in our pronunciation of foreign words. For example, we pronounce Leyden (Lī'-den) as the Dutch do, but we anglicize the Hague (Hāg) instead of following the Dutch sound of Haag. The teacher should consult the GLOSSARY and guide the class in the correct pronunciation; but it is still more important that the pupils speak the proper names clearly and boldly. Two good books on Holland for children are Hans Brinker and The Land of Pluck by Mary Mapes Dodge.

MOTLEY (1814–1877) was a diplomatist and a historian. His works all deal with the great struggle of Holland for independence. The teacher will find his Rise of the Dutch Republic a most fascinating book.

The Battle of Blenheim, by Robert Southey (135)

The glories of bravery and sacrifice are the usual themes of poetry about war, but in this poem Southey sets forth the horror and waste and uselessness in a way that every one can appreciate. The lesson of the poem is unmistakable to children as well as adults.

Historians have found as much difficulty as did old Kaspar in discovering what good the battle accomplished for the people of the nations at war. The victorious Duke of Marlborough, however, profited largely, for the great Blenheim palace was built in England for him at the national expense. Joseph Addison also profited, for it was his poem, the "Campaign," celebrating Marlborough's victory, which won him fame and patronage. Thackeray makes much of this incident in his lecture on Addison in the English Humourists, as well as in Henry Esmond, where the Duke of Marlborough also appears. The Churchill family has had many distinguished Englishmen since Marlborough's day, including the late Lord Randolph Churchill and his son Winston Churchill.

ROBERT SOUTHEY (1774–1843), friend of Wordsworth and Coleridge, is often spoken of with them as forming the Lake School of poets. He lived for many years at Greta Hall, near Keswick, in the beautiful lake region of northern England. His works both in prose and verse are numerous. Other of his poems suited to young readers are, the "Inchcape Rock," the "Legend of Bishop Hatto," and the "Cataract of Lodore." Of his prose works, the most popular are his biographies of Wesley and Nelson.

IV. GREAT MEN AND WOMEN

Many of the earlier selections in the book have had to do with men of heroic qualities. In this group, however, attention is centered more directly on the moral virtues that make for heroism and greatness. In the cases of Generals Grant and Lee, the selections tell of their personal traits without emphasis on their public services in order to make these two great Americans more real and familiar to the pupils. In the accounts of Crœsus and Abou Ben Adhem stress is placed directly on questions of conduct. Finally, in the wonderful story of Joan of Arc, we have human virtue in its most splendid and extraordinary form.

The Boyhood of General Grant, by Ulysses S. Grant (139)

Note with what modesty and simplicity General Grant writes of his boyhood. And note too how typical his boyhood was of that of many boys in this country. What does the class know about General Grant? of his career as a general? as president? of his trip around the world when he was received everywhere with the greatest honors? of his loss of fortune and his final heroic race against death in order to complete his "Memoirs" and thus provide money for his family? The famous scene at Appomattox when he met General Lee to arrange for the surrender of the Southern armies is perhaps the best illustration of Grant's modesty and generosity. But in all that he did we find an admirable honesty and simplicity of character. A good life of Grant for boys and girls is Ulysses S. Grant, by Lowell Coombs (The Macmillan Company).

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. General Grant's Boyhood. How It Differs From Mine. His Schooldays. General Grant at Appomattox. A Brief Account of His Life. What Did General Grant Do for His Country?

General Lee and Traveler, by Captain Robert Lee (146)

Few men have commanded such universal admiration from their associates as did General Lee. Everyone who knew him felt that it would be impossible for him to do anything mean, cowardly, or dishonest. Of splendid presence, finely educated, from one of our most distinguished families, Lee was a true gentleman as well as a great general. Now, many years after the war between the states, Northerner and Southerner join in their admiration of Lee's great qualities and claim him as one of the finest types of American.

General Lee was not the kind of man to whom stories and anecdotes attach themselves. But his horse Traveler was almost as well known as his master, and has won a place with him in history. For an account of the personal side of Lee's career, the best book is his son's Recollections and Letters of General Lee (Doubleday, Page and Co.). An excellent short biography for younger readers is the Life of Robert E. Lee, by Bradley Gilman (The Macmillan Company).

The War may be the subject for discussion in the class in connection with this and the preceding selection.

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. General Lee's Boyhood. Why Does the South Honor Lee? Why Does the North Honor Lee? Some Other Great Americans.

The Happiest Man, from Herodotus (150)

The story, here retold from Herodotus, takes us farther back into the past than any of the preceding selections. At the very dawn of history we find a man counting himself happy because he has great wealth; and we have also the wisdom which warns us against pride. It is perhaps too much to expect the children to get the historical perspective, but they should be able to seize the moral.

Abou Ben Adhem, by Leigh Hunt (155)

The poem is a parable. In a parable there is a story and a moral application of the story. The name of the hero suggests that he is not a Christian, and hence he is not among those at first recorded by the angel. But love for his fellow-men wins for him the love of God. This is a good poem to commit to memory.

On the monument to LEIGH HUNT (1784–1859) in Kensal Green cemetery is the inscription "Write me as one that loves his fellow-men." Note that the theme of the poem recurs again in the two Christmas stories (p. 269) and in the "King of the Golden River" (p. 320).

The Noble Nature, by Ben Jonson (156)

This beautiful stanza by Shakespeare's friend and fellow poet is suitable for memorizing. Its connection with the other selections in this group is obvious.

Joan of Arc, by Andrew Lang (157)

The pages of the FIFTH READER open on many of the great vistas of history — England under the Normans, the Swiss struggle for independence, the discovery, settlement, growth, and development of America. But there is no story in history more wonderful than that of the Maid of France, and no person in history more worthy of our admiration. Nor is there any story which better deserves a place in the imaginations of boys and girls. The main qualification for the teacher is that she too should feel the wonder of the story and the sincere faith, the purity of character, the simple patriotism, and the inspired bravery of the peasant girl.

Some notion of the France of Joan can be given to the class by means of photographs of the great cathedrals — Rheims, Rouen, Notre Dame, Chartres. They were already venerable by Joan's time, but they may suggest the way in which the Church dominated the life of everybody from peasant to King. And these magnificent churches — like Joan's deeds — are witnesses of the power of religious faith.

Though Joan was condemned as a heretic and witch, this sentence was revoked by the Pope twenty-five years after her death. In 1908 she was canonized as a saint of the Roman Catholic Church.

The selection is abridged from Andrew Lang's Red True Story Book. His Maid of France (1908) is one of the best histories of her life, concerning which he was an authority. The Maid has inspired many writers with enthusiastic admiration; Schiller's Die Jungfrau von Orleans, Southey's Joan of Arc, and Mark Twain's Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc. See also the account by Charles Dickens in his Child's History of England. There have been many paintings and statues of Joan, and recently a statue has been placed on Riverside Drive, New York.

For comments on the pronunciation of foreign names, see the Note on the " Siege of Leyden." The names here offer little difficulty.

V. ANIMALS

How much do the boys and girls in your class have to do with domestic animals? What pets do they have? What do they know about cats? dogs? horses? The first opportunity that a boy has to choose between cruelty and kindness is often in his treatment of his dumb friends. The first two of these selections tell of heroic dogs; the last two tell stories of horses.

Among the books about animals that can be recommended for boys and girls from nine to twelve, are Dr. John Brown's Rab and His Friends, Jackson's Cat Stories and Letters from a Cat, Kipling's Jungle Books, Miller's First Book of Birds, Seton's Biography of a Grizzly, Sewell's Black Beauty, and the St. Nicholas Animal Stories.

The Bell of Atri, by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (172)

This is the longest story in verse that we have had. Several still longer are to follow. The pupils should read the poem through by themselves before reading it aloud. It may be well to ask for brief accounts of the story, and to make sure that the class has grasped its essentials before reading in the class. It will also be necessary to assure the class as to the pronunciation of the Italian names. Note that the poem is divided into paragraphs. The poem should be read aloud by paragraphs.

This poem and "Paul Revere's Ride" (Reader, p. 201) appear in Longfellow's Tales of a Wayside Inn. Another poem in the same collection that the class should read is the "Birds of Killingworth."

In the Helps to Study, the first group of questions deals with the content of the poem. The second group with particular images and expressions. These may be discussed after the poem has been read aloud. The description at the opening may be compared with a picture of some Italian hill town. The briony vine reminds the poet of garlands hung in fulfillment of a vow before a wayside shrine. The hunting and falcon of the Knight may recall Scott's "Hunting Song" (p. 40).

How Buck Saved His Master, by Jack London (178)

Mr. Jack London's Call of the Wild has already won the right to be called a classic. It is a classic of a new land, Alaska. The Helps to Study in the Reader provide for the careful analysis of the story. Correlated topics are: Alaska, dogs. You could scarcely find more interesting topics for class discussion.

How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix, by Robert Browning (184)

This poem is without historic basis, the ride being wholly of Browning's invention. Note the number of details in each stanza, and how they unite into a vivid description, as that of the start in the first stanza, of the horse in the fifth stanza, of the last dash in the ninth stanza. Like the "Bell of Atri," the method of teaching may be (1) silent reading, (2) discussion of the content, (3) reading aloud, (4) discussion of the imagery in each stanza, (5) final rapid reading aloud. Note that the verse imitates the gallop of the horses, in stanzas 1, 2, and 9; and throughout suggests hurry and movement. The class should learn to read it aloud with rapidity and vigor.

Other famous rides are: "Paul Revere's Ride," by Longfellow (p. 201); "Sheridan's Ride," by T. B. Read; the "Charge of the Light Brigade," by Tennyson (p. 122); the "History of John Gilpin," by Cowper; and the ride of Ichabod Crane in the "Legend of Sleepy Hollow," by Washington Irving (SIXTH READER).

Other famous horses are Bucephalus of Alexander the Great, General Lee's Traveler (p. 146), and Kentucky Belle, celebrated in the poem of that title by Miss Constance Woolson. Remind the class of Job's war horse, referred to in "Football at Rugby" — "He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha; and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting."

Some account of Robert Browning is given on p. 235.

Rab, by Dr. John Brown (188)

The best-known book about a dog is Dr. Brown's Rab and his Friends. What does the class make out of this description? Can they draw a picture of Rab? For a composition, they may describe a dog or tell a dog story. If any of them prefer, let them write descriptions or stories of cats.

VI. HOME AND COUNTRY

The poems in this group emphasize the close relations between love of home and love of country. The teaching of patriotism in the school should be connected with the teaching of loyalty and duty in the home, in school, and in all the everyday affairs of life. Several of the poems tell of famous events in the early history of our country, the "Landing of the Pilgrims," "Paul Revere's Ride," and "Marion's Men." Others treat rather of sentiment; the "Old Oaken Bucket" of the affectionate remembrance of the home of childhood; Scott's "Love of Country" of the feeling of patriotism; and Collins's "How Sleep the Brave" of the honor and admiration paid to those who have given their lives to their country.

Since this group is composed entirely of poems, an opportunity is afforded for special attention to reading verse aloud. The poems are suited to patriotic anniversaries, as Flag Day, Memorial Day, Washington's Birthday, Lincoln's Birthday; and may be used for those occasions instead of being taken together as they come in the Reader.

Song of Marion's Men, by William Cullen Bryant (190)

For reading aloud this poem offers no greater difficulties than several which have appeared earlier in the book. Its simple stanzas, its marked pauses at the end of the lines, and its lively movement are qualities also to be found in Scott's "Hunting Song," the "Wreck of the Hesperus," "Arnold of Winkelried," and "Hohenlinden."

Our Revolutionary War has not been touched upon before in this book, and may well be made the subject of some talk in the class.

The imagery of the poem is very simple. The greenwood is a forest, the cypress tree a tent. The wind is hollow-sounding as if it had come through a hollow cave; again it moans and grieves, and again it is a steed with tossing mane.

The standard biography of Bryant is by Parke Godwin, the life in the American Men of Letters series by John Bigelow, that in the English Men of Letters series by W. A. Bradley.

How Sleep the Brave, by William Collins (195)

This beautiful poem may well be committed to memory by the class in connection with Memorial Day. It expresses our feelings toward both the Blue and the Gray.

The images are too exquisite for dissection. But the class should picture the soldier's grave decked by Spring and surrounded by unseen mourners, chief among whom are Honor and Liberty.

William Collins was an eighteenth-century poet of remarkable gifts.

The Old Oaken Bucket, by Samuel Woodworth (196)

The "Old Oaken Bucket" is not great poetry, but it touches sentiments well-nigh universal in our country, and hence has become a classic. It is also one of the few well-known poems which sings the praises of water rather than of the wine of the "blushing goblet." The class might draw pictures to illustrate this poem.

Samuel Woodworth (1785–1842) wrote many patriotic songs, but this seems to be the only one likely to survive.

Love of Country, by Sir Walter Scott (198)

A selection to be committed to memory and recited.

The Landing of the Pilgrims, by Mrs. Hemans (199)

This poem is worth committing to memory. The vision of America as a land of liberty and religious freedom is one that the class should understand. Mrs. Hemans (1793–1835) is best known by this poem and "Casabianca."

Paul Revere's Ride, by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (201)

Few narrative poems are better suited to reading and appreciation by boys and girls than "Paul Revere's Ride." In story, historical setting, imagery, and versification it affords an admirable example of poetry for younger readers.

The story is divided into two parts: (1) the signal light in the church tower, (2) the ride itself. Finally the last two stanzas tell of the ensuing battle and of the lasting meaning of this call to arms.

The historical setting is assumed by the poet to be familiar to his readers. It certainly should be familiar to all American children, but in many schools it will be necessary for the teacher to make sure that the class knows something about the occupation of Boston by the British troops, the state of preparation in the Massachusetts colony, the reasons for the expedition to Lexington and Concord, and the battle which marked the beginning of the Revolutionary War. The geographical details should also be traced out by the class on a map.

The imagery of the poem especially deserves attention in two respects. First, note the setting given in the first part of the poem for the signal in the belfry. The quiet, moonlight scene and the shadowy loneliness make a contrasting prelude for the lively ride which follows. The imagery of the churchyard, the phantom ship, the adjectives, spectral, gloomy, trembling, shadowy, somber, all help to heighten this effect. Second, note the way in which the purpose of the ride is given significance and grandeur by the imagery. It is not merely Paul Revere, but the fate of a nation that is riding. The spark from the horse's hoof is the spark that is to kindle the land to war. This ride will never be forgotten, for its midnight message is that of defense of our country which our people will always be ready to waken and hear.

The versification, with its stanzas of varying length, its irregular rhyming scheme, and its frequent use of three-syllable feet, lends itself to expressive reading. The class should note and express the difference between the hushed and expectant effect of the description of the signal and the vigorous movement of the lines that tell of the ride.

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. A Brief Account of the Ride. A Story of the Battles of Lexington and Concord. The Battle of Lexington Won by the Farmers. Why the Americans Were Fighting the British. The Story of Paul Revere's Ride as Told by the Man who Gave the Signal in the Belfry. Why We To-day Should Listen to Hear the Midnight Message of Paul Revere.

VII. BOYS AND GIRLS

These selections were written for boys and girls and about boys and girls. They should be able to appreciate the fun and joy, the mistakes and pathos, the hopes and ideals, and the tests and standards offered in these poems and stories. What are the reactions between this literature and your pupils? Do they write and act plays, as did Tom Bailey? Do they admire the nobility of John Halifax? Do they feel a sense of responsibility in response to the love and expectations of their parents as these are expressed in "Little Brown Hands" and the "Children's Hour"?

In many of the selections in the FIFTH READER, it is the part of the teacher to remove difficulties, make explanations, and lead the child to understand a past age, strange manners, or lofty ideals of conduct. In this group, the teacher may trust herself to the class. Encourage them to lead the way, to offer their own comments, to make the connections between the selections and their life. The teacher should follow after to correct and guide.

Other selections in the Reader which also have to do with boys and girls are: the "Last Lesson," "Football at Rugby," "Boyhood of General Grant," and the two Christmas stories in the next group.

The Theater in our Barn, by Thomas Bailey Aldrich (208)

Aldrich's Story of a Bad Boy is based on the author's own boyhood, and really tells not of a bad boy but of a very normal boy. Another selection from it, the "Last Voyage of the Dolphin," is given in the FOURTH READER. Every boy should read the book.

THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH (1836–1907) was born in Portsmouth, N. H., where his boyhood was spent and the incidents occurred that suggested the Story of a Bad Boy. He was the author of many poems and novels, and for nearly ten years the editor of the Atlantic Monthly.

Topics for Oral Composition. Our Theater. My First Visit to the Theater. A Play That I Wrote.

The Children's Hour, by Longfellow (222)

The only difficulty in this poem is offered by the imagery. The children are the besieging army, the study is the castle, and the armchair the turret which they assail. Then the figure is changed. The father holds fast the children and will hold them forever in the round tower of his heart.

The Mouse-trap, a ruined castle on the Rhine, is still pointed out to travelers. The story goes that the bishop, in the time of famine, enticed the villagers into a barn, and then set fire to the barn and burned them all. In punishment, a plague of rats ate all the corn that he had stored in the castle, and finally ate the bishop himself. See the poem, the "Legend of Bishop Hatto," by Robert Southey.

Moses Goes to the Fair, by Oliver Goldsmith (214)

The Vicar of Wakefield, by Oliver Goldsmith, is one of the masterpieces of fiction that all of the class should read sometime. Some further selections from Chapter I, which tells of the family, and from Chapter III and IV, which tell of their life after the loss of fortune, might be read to the class to serve as an introduction for the adventure of Moses.

An account of the life of Goldsmith (1728–1775) is given in the Reader. The standard biography is by John Forster; the life by Washington Irving, the essay by Macaulay, and the life by Austin Dobson in the Great Writers series give good accounts of a most extraordinary life and character. Many of the stories about Goldsmith are such as a class would enjoy.

The Pied Piper, by Robert Browning (222)

Let the class draw pictures which could be used as illustrations for the poem. Let them see if they can find any rhymes which Browning did not use for rats, Piper, guilders, wink, etc. Browning was fond of his ability to find a rhyme for anything. So here, he brings in Julius Cæsar to rhyme with the river Weser, and then alludes to Cæsar's escape by swimming the river and carrying his Commentaries safe.

After the class has read the poem with pleasure, and after the difficult words have been looked up, attention may be called to the difference in sound of the passages which describe the rush of the rats and that of the children, and the difference betwen the visions of the happy lands that the Piper excited in the rats and the children. For another story of a wonderful magician, see that of Orpheus (the "Golden Fleece," pp. 315–317). For another story about rats, see Robert Southey's "Legend of Bishop Hatto" already referred to on p. 40 of the Manual.

One further suggestion may be made in regard to the long narrative poems in the Reader. Not all of them should be made the subjects of intensive study. Some ought to be read mainly for pleasure, without too much drill. One of those is the "Pied Piper."

Ingratitude, by William Shakespeare (237)

This song from Shakespeare's "As You Like It" points the same moral as the "Pied Piper" and is inserted as a sort of complement to that poem.

John Halifax, Gentleman, by Mrs. Mulock Craik (238)

After a word or two of introduction by the teacher in assigning this lesson, the pupils should be able to read this story and, with the aid of the GLOSSARY, understand all the words and phrases. In the class it should be read aloud as a continuous narrative without any unnecessary interruption. But the pupils should be able to read it aloud rapidly and intelligently. Then the text may be analyzed and discussed; any passages that cause difficulty may be read aloud.

The story, however, will bear careful analysis and may be retold in the form of oral compositions: — 1. The meeting in the rain. 2. John Halifax finds employment. 3. The Mayor's house across the street. 4. What John Halifax told of his history. 5. How John Halifax and Phineas became friends.

John Halifax, Gentleman is the best-known work of DINAH MULOCK CRAIK (1826–1887), an English novelist and poet, who also wrote many books for children.

Tom and Maggie, by George Eliot (251)

This selection offers a continuous narrative which may receive about the same treatment for class work as the preceding selection. The story of Maggie Tulliver, however, wins the interest of boys and girls for two rather different reasons. First, it impresses them by its truthfulness. The emotional struggle in both Tom and Maggie seems like a record out of our own experience. Every word or thought can be corroborated by anyone who is either an older brother or a younger sister. Second, George Eliot presents childhood not only with truth but also with poetry. The experiences and especially the affections of childhood are treated as something memorable, dear, and beautiful. That children feel something of this in the story is proved by the fact that the impressions made by their first reading of the book are so deep and abiding. It is in section III of our selection that this poetical treatment is most apparent.

The tired teacher, who contends daily with the realities of childhood, may not always respond to the appeal of its poetry. Wearied of her routine, she may feel that beauty for her lies in something less familiar, less well remembered. But really there is no one so responsive to the poetry of childhood as this same tired and overworked teacher. As you go into your school to-day, let your mind run back to the first class that you taught. How clearly the faces of those children stand out in memory; how vividly they have lived ever since in your imagination!

The voices of the classroom carry a language laden with all the associations of the years of teaching — years that are not dead but living. They live now less in their routine or drudgery than in the recollections of their service and their pleasure. And these new voices, reading the old lessons, stumbling, mispronouncing, or trembling and thrilling — as so many have done before them — will perhaps contribute their mite to that great volume of the poetry of childhood which lies ever open before the teacher.

Little Brown Hands, by M. H. Krout (267)

Why is this poem a classic? Because it expresses so simply and clearly the very charm of childhood — its innocent play and its promise for the future. How much of both the pleasure and the hope one feels in the children one loves are expressed in these four stanzas.

VIII. TWO CHRISTMASES

This Reader is for boys and girls who are old enough to be getting beyond the fairy-tale age of Santa Claus, and just old enough to appreciate the true Christmas spirit. It is the spirit not of getting but of giving, not of greed but of charity that these stories teach; and that spirit may well be taught on any day of the year.

One of the selections should certainly be read just before Christmas. The other could be reserved until later in the school year and read in connection with the children's stories of the last group. Or, both might be read together in December. They would help to make a better Christmas in many a home.

For other selections, see the Book of Christmas (Macmillan), and Dickens's Christmas Stories, especially the "Christmas Carol" and the "Chimes," and W. D. Howells' charming story, "Christmas Day."

The Cratchits' Christmas Dinner, by Dickens (269)

The "Christmas Carol" of Charles Dickens has been read in thousands of homes now these many Christmases. And from year to year and from home to home it has renewed its message of kindness and charity. The portion included in the Reader tells of the simple pleasures of the family Christmas dinner. But the pleasure of feasting is mingled with the unselfish joy taken by every member of the family in contributing to and sharing in the pleasure of the others. The goose and the pudding taste the better because every one is happy.

Tell the class something more of the story of the "Christmas Carol" and of old Scrooge's conversion.

The Sabot of Little Wolff, by François Coppee (278)

This is the story of a miracle wrought by the Christ child. Many worshipers in Catholic countries crowd to his shrines, hoping that miracles will be wrought to cure the sick and suffering. And who will not believe that such charity and sweetness as that of Little Wolff will have its reward?

François Coppée (1842–1908) won distinction as poet, dramatist, and writer of prose. He was one of the most active of French men of letters during the later part of the nineteenth century.

IX. WONDER AND ENCHANTMENT

Here are stories from two of the world's greatest sources of tales of wonder, the Greek mythology and the Arabian Nights, and from some of the world's creators of enchantment, Lowell, Ruskin, Tennyson, Goethe, and Shakespeare. The three poems included are short and readily understood. They might be read at almost any time in the course of the year's reading, though they are chosen as fitting the mood of magic and fairyland. Three of the prose selections are long and are divided into several lessons. They give an opportunity to train the class in the ability to read and analyze stories of some length and complexity.

In teaching the stories of the old wonderland of literature, it is perhaps well to remember that there is a new wonderland which has not yet been fully celebrated in poetry or romance, but which possesses the imagination of every child to-day. This wonderland of invention ought not to be overlooked in appeals to the interest of boys and girls. The phonograph is as marvelous as Echo; the electric lamp outshines Aladdin's; Jason would have exchanged his golden fleece for an aëroplane; and Prospero would have found his enchantments ineffectual in comparison with those of a modern city street. What men have dreamt and imagined of wonders and magic, men have finally surpassed by the miracles of their invention.

If your pupils accept the wonders of story land with ease, there is no need of disturbing them by comparisons with modern magic. But for some of the girls and many of the boys, a new interest may be aroused in the imaginary wonders of the past by suggesting how man's imagination has realized itself in the magical world in which we live. Some of the questions in the Reader make such comparisons. And the teacher need not fear that the magic of story land will lose its power if she shows in how many ways our wonder may be excited both by nature and by the works of man.

The Bugle Song, by Alfred Tennyson (285)

This matchless song may be read aloud by the teacher, in order to indicate to the class the way in which the verse imitates the notes of the bugle and their echoes. The poem should be committed to memory by the pupils, and it affords a good opportunity to train them in expressive reading. One may doubt, however, if it is worth while to use the poem as an elocutionary exercise.

Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp; from the Arabian Nights (286)

Several stories from the Arabian Nights are in the FOURTH READER and others may be known to the class. This selection affords a good test of the pupil's ability to follow and remember a narrative with a complication of incidents. The opportunity may also be taken to suggest the wonders of modern magic. Franklin, Morse, Bell, Edison, and Marconi are some of the modern Aladdins who have compelled the powerful genie, electricity, to do their bidding. Excellent lives of Franklin and Edison are included in the series of True Stories of Great Americans (Macmillan). Would not the children like to try illustrating this story with drawings of their own — the more fanciful the better?

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. The Story of Aladdin as Told by the Magician. As Told by the Lamp. How Franklin Summoned the Genie Electricity from the Sky. An Account of a Modern Aladdin, Thomas Edison. A Modern Jeweled Palace — a "Skyscraper" Lighted at Night.

Aladdin, by James Russell Lowell (299)

In this poem Aladdin's lamp is used as a symbol of the power of idealizing which enables its possessor to find joy in his dreams and hopes. When one has no more "Castles in Spain," there is not much satisfaction in castles of marble and gold. "Castles in Spain" is a phrase often employed to describe any day-dreams which have no real existence. Here, however, these "castles in Spain" are rather the ideals created by imagination and faith.

Jason and the Golden Fleece, by Charles Kingsley (301)

In introducing boys and girls to the wonderful stories of the Greek mythology, attention should be asked first for the stories themselves. This story of the Golden Fleece may be presented as a wonder tale like those of "Aladdin and His Lamp" and the "Pied Piper of Hamelin." In the SIXTH READER, where many Greek stories are included, attention is also paid to the antiquity and literary history of these stories; and also to the nature of the imagination which devised them. The Greek imagination has much in it akin to that of children. It filled the world of nature with personalities; the sunlit streams in the woods became nymphs, the shadows were satyrs, and " the sun, and the night, and the blue-haired sea who shakes the land " were deities. The world which man knew about and could control was a very small world, like the child's. Outside of this was the great unknown, ruled by magic, spirits, or the greater gods. Some suggestion of the way the Greeks interpreted the world of nature may be conveyed to the class; and with this should go a greater appreciation of their idea of heroism. Out from the little world that he knew about, man must bravely venture into the unknown world of magic and wonder.

In this respect the voyage after the Golden Fleece becomes typical of all human progress. Nothing daunted by the unknown and mysterious, the hero goes forth and brings back wealth or knowledge, or some other gift to humanity. The discoverers and inventors are the great Jasons who are ever overcoming the enchantments of the unknown. The class might be asked to compare Columbus with Jason, and to decide what golden fleece he brought back. Or compare Jason's contests with those of the scientists who found the cure for yellow fever.

Charles Kingsley (1819–1875) should be known to the children by his Water Babies, and to the teacher by his novels, Alton Locke, Hypatia, and Westward Ho.

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. The Voyage of the Argo. Some Other Famous Voyages on Unknown Seas. How Jason Met the Tests. Columbus Compared with Jason. Do Men ever Conquer Enchantments Today?

The King of the Golden River, by John Ruskin (319)

This charming fairy story affords an excellent opportunity for serial reading. The first chapter of the story has been omitted and its contents condensed in an introductory note. Each of the four chapters, as they appear in the Reader, is distinct in itself and yet closely connected with the others. Each chapter may be taken for a single lesson, and an additional lesson given for rapid reading of the whole.

In comparison with such tales of wonder as "Jason and the Golden Fleece" and "Aladdin and His Lamp," this story has two distinct qualities, the beauty of its descriptions of nature and the nobility of its teaching of unselfishness. Ruskin's wonderful power in picturing the play of light and mist and storm among the mountain peaks and torrents is fully exemplified in this selection, and the beauty and vividness of such pictures should be appreciated by the class. But how many of your pupils ever saw a mountain? or a glacier? or good photographs of the Alps? Men brought up on the prairie often prefer the wide horizons of their boyhood to any other natural scenes that they may later visit. Men brought up in the mountains rarely see much beauty in the prairies. What do the members of your class find most beautiful in nature — sunset, mountain glade, the lawn in the park, the prairie in spring, or what? Perhaps Ruskin's descriptions can be used to encourage them to a free expression of their own feelings, and to a new interest in the pleasure that comes from observing beauty in its manifold forms.

The virtue of unselfishness has been taught in many of the stories in the FIFTH READER, but nowhere more persuasively than here. As the kindness of Little Wolff is glorified by the Christ child, so the kindness of little Gluck moves mountains and wins the admiration of generations who tell his story. In some other stories enchantment and magic have come to the aid of bravery and daring, but here they serve unselfishness.

A brief account of Ruskin's life is given in the Reader. Many interesting incidents of his childhood will be found in his own delightful Præterita.

The Erl-King, by Johann Wolfgang Goethe (346)

Like some of the old ballads, this poem tells in dramatic form of death met through enchantment. In the other selections in this group magic has brought wealth, happiness, and rewards for virtues. Here Death is the mystery that rides through wonderland as well as through the real world. Goethe's verses, often sung to Schubert's music, have made the old legend one of the best-known poems.

The Story of the Tempest, by Mary Lamb (350)

The Tales from Shakespeare are not intended to take the place of the plays, but to serve as an introduction to them. There are some songs and some passages in Shakespeare which can be read by children at an early age; but it is also desirable for them to make an early acquaintance with the persons and stories of some of the plays. In connection with this "Story of the Tempest," the fairy scenes from Midsummer-Night's Dream might be read in the class. (See Everyday English, Book I, p. 218, for a suitable version.)

In many schools scenes from the plays are acted, and even the younger children enjoy taking part. In the SIXTH READER, the casket scenes from the Merchant of Venice are arranged for school dramatics, and in the Teachers' Manual for that Reader, some observations are made on school performances of Shakespeare. It may be noted here that even the great historical plays like Julius Cæsar and Coriolanus may be acted by schoolboys. But in any play or scene to be acted, a considerable amount of cutting will be necessary.

The "Story of the Tempest" contains two of Shakespeare's most lovely songs and often follows very closely the speeches of the leading characters. A full account of the play can be found in any good edition; e.g. The Tudor Shakespeare.

It would seem that Shakespeare must have thought of the close of his own career as he wrote of Prospero's retirement. Certainly no poem or play suggests more insistently the magical power of the imagination. No magic, even that of modern invention, seems more marvelous to us than the power which can create men and women and stories that generations of men love and believe. At the close of the FIFTH READER of stories, and of this group of tales of wonder, the pupil should have some feeling for the enchantments which have wrought this book. What power had Aladdin's genii of the lamp and the ring, or the witch maiden Medea, or Prospero himself compared with those magicians who make stories and poems that live forever?

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. The Story of Miranda. The Story of Ferdinand. An Afternoon with Ariel. The Story of Titania and Bottom. A Book that I Like. The Magic Land of Books.

THE SIXTH READER

The SIXTH READER is, like the FIFTH READER, a story book, but a book of world famous stories. It draws from the great myths of Greece and the Northland, and from the great narratives of the Bible, of Homer, of Virgil, of the chivalric romances, and of Shakespeare. It is a story book that glimpses the progress of civilization, and opens to its boy and girl readers long vistas into the world's history. In short, it is primarily a book of classics, of stories that have been famous among many peoples, and for long times, of classics with which every one must be familiar if he is to share in the accumulated wealth of the human mind.

In the Manual to the FIFTH READER, emphasis was placed on the part of the teacher in helping the pupils to understand the stories and to read them understandingly. That is again the primary purpose of the teacher in using the SIXTH READER. But here the understanding of the stories involves an introduction to the great story lands of the past, to the gardens of the Hesperides, the lofty towers of Troy, the Egypt of the Pharaohs, the shining city of Asgard, and to King Arthur's court at Camelot. These places are all a long distance from Missouri or Minnesota of to-day, if we measure the distance in space or time. But they are not far removed if measured by the swiftness of a boy's imagination. How can the teacher help that imagination on its journey? By going with it and by reassuring the younger traveler by telling of the millions who have already made that journey with delight.

The story of Hector, for example, is a good story. It is enjoyed among the mountains of Tennessee to-day as well as in the Athens of Pericles. First of all, the pupil should read it clearly and understand what it tells. But the story of Hector is a story that has been told to generation after generation. Its lessons and ideals have stirred men for many centuries. And in turn it has become the theme and inspiration for other stories and poems. Its persons and places and deeds have become symbols and bywords and proverbs. All literature since is full of it. Of almost every incident or expression, the teacher might say, "thereby hangs a tale." Paris, Helen, Achilles, Priam, Ajax, and the rest, — these are persons you will meet in every turn of your reading.

By the sixth grade, the boy or girl begins to be interested not merely in the story but in its relations to the huge world about him. What he reads is not merely fairy-land or another world than ours; he begins to ask, why was this written? why do I read it? what do other persons think about it? In the SIXTH READER, more than in any of the preceding, provision is made for answering just such queries. In this Manual the effort is made to provide suggestions of ways in which the teacher may enrich the class-room hour. During the journeys of the pupil's imagination, the teacher is the guide who has many things to point out through the open windows.

Variety of Selections

The selections in the Reader are not all from the great narratives of the world's literature. American literature and history receive full attention, and the story of David Copperfield has been chosen not less for its interest to boys and girls than for its greatness as fiction. The selections in the group Our Country are in part from great orations, and give a chance for a style of expression by no means to be neglected in teaching reading. Another section, Poems Grave and Gay, supplies a group of poems offering notable variety in content and also in their requirements for reading aloud. Throughout the book especial opportunity is given (1) for reading consecutively, and (2) for reading dialogue. Certain selections are intended to test the pupils' ability not merely to read an incident of a page or two but to read a series of connected stories, and keep them in mind as a whole. The selections telling of Hercules and those of Troy are examples of this; and at the close of the book, four closely connected episodes from David Copperfield are united in the form of a brief serial. One lesson may often be devoted to the reading aloud of one of these connected groups. Dialogue abounds in many of the stories and gives an opportunity for dramatic reading. The five scenes from the Merchant of Venice which relate the story of Portia make a little play by themselves.

Order of the Selections

The arrangement of selections in groups becomes somewhat more important in this than in the preceding Readers. The groups dealing with the story of Troy, with David Copperfield, with the Northern Myths, and with Portia's Suitors manifestly gain a great deal by being treated as units. On the other hand, such groups as POEMS GRAVE AND GAY, and OUR COUNTRY, can be readily rearranged or separated as the teacher may desire. Many teachers will probably wish to change somewhat the order of the selections in order to suit the particular needs and interests of their classes.

In order to suggest how freely the order may be amended, the following alternative arrangement is offered.

Hercules and the Golden Apples, I, II, III.
The Psalm of Life.
The Story of the Fisherman.
To a Waterfowl.
Joseph and his Brethren, I, II, III.
The Twenty-Third Psalm.
The Siege of Troy (all the selections in Group I, except the first).
Northern Myths (Group II, entire), with the " Blind Men and the Elephant ").
The Burial of Moses.
The Age of Chivalry (Group IV, entire, except the " Knight and the Saracen ").
Robinson Crusoe and his Man Friday.
Robinson Crusoe's Island.
The Gettysburg Speech (for Lincoln's birthday).
The Recessional.
The Ship of State.
The Early Life of Washington.
Jefferson on the Character of Washington (Washington's Birthday).
Belshazzar's Feast.
Destruction of Sennacherib.
The Deacon's Masterpiece.
The Childhood of David Copperfield (entire).

The Concord Hymn.
John Adams' Supposed Speech.
The Knight and the Saracen.
The Cloud.
Portia's Suitors (entire).
The Bells.
Liberty and Union.
Union and Liberty.

Helps to Study

The Helps to Study accompanying each selection in the Reader are addressed to the pupil. They usually consist of three parts with three different purposes. (1) The introductory matter supplying explanation and setting for the story is more extensive than in the preceding Readers. It often precedes instead of following the selection. In a number of cases the introductory matter has been made into special articles, as "What are the Greeks to Us?" (p. 34), and the "Age of Chivalry" (p. 180), which apply to entire groups of selections. (2) The questions to guide and test the pupil's study aim to insure his understanding of the selection, the connection of the selection with his reading and experience, and the detailed study of words and phrases. (3) Lists of difficult words and phrases are given after each selection. In case of most proper names and of unusual obsolete or foreign words, the definition and pronunciation are given. The list of the Greek gods on pp. 46, 47 and the pronouncing lists will be found especially helpful. Often, however, the pupil is referred to the Glossary. He should be constantly encouraged to use the dictionary freely; and as a convenient substitute for the dictionary, there is the Glossary at the end of the book.

There the pronunciation and definition of each word is given.

In the Manual for the FIFTH READER extended suggestions are offered for "Drill on Words and Phrases." These suggestions may be applied to the work with the SIXTH READER, and especially to the work early in the year. In Group I on Greece and Rome the teacher should make sure that the class can pronounce the names readily. As the class advances, however, less drill may be required on words and phrases, and an increased amount of time spent in class discussion of the many interesting topics which the selections afford.

LITERARY APPRECIATION

In this SIXTH READER there is a greater opportunity than in the earlier books to dwell on literary values and appreciation. The lives of the authors and matters of literary history receive more attention; and there is abundant chance to use the book in connection with wider readings in the great fields of literature to which it opens gateways. But the service of an introduction to literature is more distinctly and explicitly performed by the Seventh and Eighth Books. Here the purpose is not so much to make the child feel that a given selection is literature by its quality as to make him understand that it is a part of what all men read. Emphasis has been laid in every Reader on the purpose of the Everyday Classics to afford the teacher a means of introducing the child to the heritage of the race. In the SIXTH READER it becomes possible for the child to understand something of this purpose and to share consciously in the satisfaction of testing his feelings and sentiments by those of his parents and other predecessors in the paths of culture.

It is the persons and events, rather than the style, on which his attention should be focused. Hector, Moses, Siegfried, Sir Galahad, Columbus, Washington, Robinson Crusoe — these give the food for his imagination, and the means by which it may be brought in accord with the best of the world's mind. But now and again, this imagination should also be directed to a masterpiece of expression, as expression. "The Twenty-Third Psalm," the "Concord Hymn," the "Gettysburg Speech," Shelley's "Cloud," — each of these in its own way is a thing of imperishable beauty. And as such it should be offered to the child. A little dogmatism by the teacher will not hurt. Now and then there will be occasion to say, 'This is great literature, to be read reverently and lovingly.' Some dire judgment should certainly overtake any system which makes such masterpieces as these abhorred exercises. The teacher should come back year after year to these temples with the same admiration and wonder which she would transmit to her pupils.

I. GREECE AND ROME

In most schools to-day the pupils of the Sixth Grade have already had some introduction to the myths and legends of ancient Greece. How much do they remember at the beginning of the school year? Do they know the names of some of the chief deities and their attributes? Have they read the stories of Jason and the Golden Fleece? (FIFTH READER, p. 301); of Perseus and Andromeda? of Ulysses? Do they understand how the Greeks looked upon the world of sky, earth, sea, and forest as peopled by many powerful spirits who intervened constantly in the affairs of men? The teacher will do well to discover how much or how little impression the stories of Greece and Rome have already made on their minds.

The imagination of the child is in many ways strikingly akin to the myth-making imagination of the Greeks. He delights in personifying nature and in devising adventures which are aided and magnified by the unknown powers of the air. We have all come to see that Greek literature has something to offer the child as well as the scholar. As fairy tales, as legends of valor and strength, or as myths translating the universe into story, the Greek heroes and deities make a very direct appeal to childhood.

The first selection in this group, "Hercules and the Golden Apples," lends itself readily to this appeal. Like most of the other stories in Hawthorne's Wonder Book and Tanglewood Tales or in Charles Kingsley's Greek Heroes, it is a story of adventure and wonder. It suits the myth-making age of childhood.

The other selections have this interest as stories but they are chosen also to suggest another interest which Greek literature may have for older boys and girls. They are some of the most famous incidents from the poems of Homer and the Æneid of Virgil. They suggest the immense effect which Greek literature has had on the world and the great part which Greece has played in the advance of civilization. "The glory that was Greece and the grandeur that was Rome" are not ideas reserved merely for scholars and poets; something of their meaning can be grasped by every schoolboy.

Hercules and the Golden Apples, I, II, III (11)

This section offers little difficulty and is suited to rapid reading. With its mixture of dialogue, direct narrative and brief description, it affords at the beginning of the year a good test of the pupils' ability to read aloud with distinctness and variety of expression.

It gives comparatively little occasion for a detailed study of expression or allusions, but it does offer opportunity for wide and interesting comment on many matters suggested by the story. It may serve as a clew to recall what the pupils know of Greek myth and legend, or what other stories they have read of dragons or giants. The method of class presentation might follow some such arrangement as this: —

1. Question the class as to what they know of Hercules and of Greece. Assignment of Part I for reading and study. The pupil to read the selection at his desk or at home, preparing himself by the aid of the Helps to Study.

2. Reading aloud of Part I in the class, with careful attention to pronunciation, enunciation, and expression. Further talk in the class of other Greek stories. Assignment of Part II, to be read by pupils.

3. Reading aloud of Part II. Answering and discussing the questions in the Helps to Study. Assignment of Part III to be read by the pupils, with notice that they are to review their knowledge of giants.

4. Reading aloud of Part III. Who can tell brief stories of giants or dragons? of David and Goliath? of Siegfried and the dragon? of Gulliver in the land of the Brobdingnags? of Jack and the Beanstalk? of Jack the Giant Killer? Assignment of the reading of Parts I, II, and III, so that pupils will be prepared to tell the whole story.

5. Final reading aloud of the three Selections, rapidly; or oral composition by pupils on some of the following topics: — How Hercules Looked. The Old Man of the Sea. The Giant Atlas. Another Adventure of Hercules. Who were some of the Greek Gods? Another Greek Story (Jason, Perseus, Midas). The Life of Nathaniel Hawthorne (FIFTH READER, p. 75).

An excellent book for supplementary reading is Mrs. Baker's Stories of Old Greece and Rome (Macmillan).

What Are the Greeks to Us? (34)

In the note entitled "What Are the Greeks to Us?" an attempt has been made to give in a few words some notion of Greek civilization to boys and girls. This note furnishes a text which the teacher may amplify so far as time permits.

Various suggestions are made in connection with the different selections. One general comment may be offered. Even a hasty glance at Greek literature should be accompanied by some glimpses of Greek art. There are many good cheap photographic reproductions of Greek temples and sculptures. If the class is fortunate enough to have access to an art museum, the Greek vases will prove especially interesting to the pupils.

Hector and Andromache (38)

This and the following selection are taken from A. J. Church's Story of the Iliad (Macmillan, Pocket Classics), an admirable rendering for boys and girls. The language is simple and there is little need of analysis of phrases. Considerable attention, however, should be paid to the pronunciation of proper names and the identification of the various persons mentioned.

The teacher may give a few rules for the pronunciation of classical names; c like k except before e, i, and y; ch like k; final eus one syllable with long ū. The proper pronunciations are indicated in the lists at the end of the selections. The pupils should read the lists, pronouncing the names correctly, until they are able to use the words readily.

The list of deities given in the Helps to Study should not be memorized but should be used for reference. They should also be made the basis of discussion until they become familiar.

The wonderful scene of the parting of Hector and Andromache is one of the most beautiful in all literature. After the teacher is satisfied that the class can read it understandingly, she may pass on to question on the matters discussed in the Helps to Study. First, it is important that the class should master a brief outline of the main events of the Trojan war, such as is given in the Reader on p. 38. The story of the apple of discord and the judgment of Paris should be retold. Second, as the pupils read this and the following selections of the group, they should get an increasing knowledge of Greek religion. Review questions should recall the information given in the Reader on pp. 34–36. Third, attention should be called to the information given in the selections about the life and habits of these ancient times. For example, weapons are of bronze, not steel; even the princesses weave and spin; and even Helen is found busy at household tasks.

Of course, the main source of information on all these matters is the Iliad itself. There could be no better way to supplement this and the following selections than by reading of other episodes in the Trojan war either from A. J. Church's Story of the Iliad, or the Butcher-Lang Translation of the Iliad (both in Macmillan's Pocket Classics). The stories of the apple of discord and the judgment of Paris, of Achilles' quarrel with Agamemnon should be recalled.

The Duel of Hector and Ajax (48)

This selection carries on the story of Hector, the chief defender and hope of Troy. Here the interest is in a fight, but there are many details describing the life of these peoples of long ago, their feasts and councils, and their ideas of bravery and honor.

The Death of Hector (56)

This famous passage is given in Bryant's blank verse translation. Blank verse consists of unrhymned pentameters, and in reading full value should be given to the lines and the measure. In addition to the pauses required by the sense, a pause should be made at the end of each line. It is better for the pupils to overdo this than to slur it. In giving full value to the five feet in each line, many syllables which would be slighted in conversation require accent, especially final -ly. Proper names also require distinct enunciation, and full value should be given to all the vowel sounds. Final -ed pronounced as a separate syllable by poetic usage is marked èd in the text.

The long sentences will require special attention since the clauses and phrases are often given different positions from those which they would occupy in prose. Some parts of the selection should first be read aloud by the teacher as a guide to the class.

An account of the life of WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, with a portrait, is given in the FIFTH READER, pp. 193, 194.

Topics for Oral or Written Composition. The Cause of the Trojan War. Priam and his City. Hector. Achilles. Andromache. Helen.

Ulysses and the Cyclops, I, II (62)

This famous adventure tells of cruel might overcome by craft. Like the story of "Hercules and the Golden Apples," it tells how a giant was tricked. The giant stories which were recalled in connection with that selection may be again reviewed. It will be interesting to see how often the powerful and cruel monster proves a very stupid person and is defeated by craft. If a moral is to be drawn, it would seem to be that brains are mightier than muscle. At all events the imagination which peopled the unknown regions of the world with huge monsters also invented heroes who were brave and wise enough to outwit them. And the imagination has thus foreshadowed the progress of civilization. Crafty man has overthrown the fiercer beasts and subdued the most powerful forces of nature.

If time permits, tell the class more of the adventures of Ulysses with Circe, or Nausicaa, or of his return home. Or, read them selections from Church's Story of the Odyssey, or Lang, Leaf, and Myers's Translation (both in Macmillan's Pocket Classics Series). Or, read Tennyson's Ulysses, a splendid expression of daring adventure.

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. The Story of the Odyssey. How to Conquer Giants. Some Modern Giants that Man has Slain by Craft.

Some of the fabulous persons of Greek story might make topics for further discussion: nymphs, cyclops, sirens, fauns, satyrs, dryads, amazons.

The Story of Æneas (76)

Part I of the Story of Æneas completes the famous tale of Troy, and Part II, the Escape of Æneas, starts the hero on his long travels which are to end with the founding of Rome. The narrative of Virgil is full of events and persons which have become proverbial among educated people. The wooden horse, false Sinon, the Greeks bearing gifts, Laocoön, the faithful Æneas — these are phrases which "every schoolboy" used to understand. Nor are they merely phrases. Each one is a link which binds together the thought and feeling of many generations. Test the pupils on their own application of these phrases to persons and events in their own experience or reading. What other false Sinons do they know? What other examples of filial devotion like that of Æneas?

With Part II of this selection we leave the world of Greece and Rome. The teacher may, however, find time to talk with the class about the history of Rome, — its rise from a mere village to a great nation, its long contest with its great rival, Carthage, the expansion of its power over the entire Mediterranean region, and its final overthrow by the barbaric tribes from the Northern forests.

Photographs may be used to illustrate the mighty ruins which still remain of the imperial city. As Byron says in the stanza on p. 75 of the Reader, the literature of Rome has outlived its empire and its buildings. Byron also expresses the belief that Rome was greater as a free republic than as an empire ruling over subject states.

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. The Story of the Fall of Troy as told by Astyanax. As told by Creusa. What is Admirable in the Character of Æneas? A Brief Account of the Trojan War. "The Glory that was Greece." "The Grandeur that was Rome." What do we know that the Greeks did not?

II. IN BIBLE LANDS

The selections from the Bible should be treated in the class precisely like selections from other great literature. They are poems and stories presenting the records of a great civilization and the lives of great men. The "Twenty-Third Psalm" is one of the most beautiful poems in literature. There is scarcely a story better told or more perfect in construction than that of "Joseph and his Brethren." In Daniel and Moses we have great leaders distinguished by wisdom and moral courage. The world has long enjoyed and profited by the literature of the Old Testament; and there is no part of the heritage of the race which can be better entered upon in childhood.

The Twenty-Third Psalm (96)

Several matters set forth in the Helps to Study in the Reader may well be emphasized in order to secure a full appreciation of the selection by the class. First, it is a poem, though the English translation is not in verse. Second, the imagery of the shepherd caring for his flock is natural to a pastoral people. Third, there has been scarcely an hour since it was first written that this psalm has not been on the lips of some worshiper.

How many of the class never saw a flock of sheep? Millet's pictures of sheep offer perhaps the best commentary and appreciation of this psalm.

In Bible Lands (97)

This passage serves to explain and introduce the selections of this group. It should be read by the class, and its contents reviewed from time to time in connection with the selections that follow.

Joseph and His Brethren, Genesis XXVII–XLV (99)

This wonderful story may be read primarily as a story. As divided in the Reader each part is complete in itself and yet excites the expectation as to what is to follow. In Part I we are told of the cruel misfortune which came to Joseph and of his success in the Court of Egypt; but we are left wondering what became of his father and brothers, how his dream of the sheaves is to come true, and what the years of plenty and of famine have to do with the story. In Part II we are told of the need of his brothers, their journey to Egypt, and of Joseph's kindness to them and of his demand to see his own brother Benjamin; but we are left wondering what Joseph's plans are and uncertain what action he is going to take toward the wicked brothers. In Part III, the suspense is maintained until the very end when Joseph finally reveals himself and his purpose.

The main plot should be followed and understood by the pupils, so that they can retell the story in outline without confusing events or interest.

The story is also rich in minor incidents. These should not be permitted to confuse the pupils' clear understanding of the main story; but they add greatly to its vividness. Take, for example, the first paragraph. What do we learn about Jacob? about Joseph? about his coat? about his brethren?

The story is well suited to analysis by the class, (1) into its main outline, (2) into the minor incidents which fill out the main story.

The wisdom, uprightness, and affection of Joseph appear throughout the story and should be brought home to the class. The story tells of moral issues. At every stage Judah or Reuben or Joseph has a choice between opposite courses of action. The story at every turn depends on a moral choice.

The Biblical proper names offer less difficulty than the Greek, but new names should be noted and pronounced when the lesson is first assigned for study.

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. How they lived in Canaan. The Kingdom of Pharaoh. For what is Egypt famous? The Character of Joseph.

The Burial of Moses, by Mrs. Alexander (118)

The story of Moses should be told by pupils or teacher as a preparation to the reading of this poem. Its simple meter and finely sustained emotion fit it for recitation.

Mrs. CECIL (Humphreys) ALEXANDER (1818–1895) was a writer of both prose and verse. Her Hymns for Little Children proved to be one of the most popular volumes of the century, for it went through sixty-nine editions in less than fifty years. Some of her hymns, as "Once in royal David's city" and "There is a green hill far away," are sung wherever the English language is spoken.

Belshazzar's Feast, Daniel V (122)

The scene changes from Egypt and Palestine to Babylon. The class should find these places on a map, and something might be told them of the great civilizations that developed along the banks of the Nile and Euphrates. These two great rivers with their fertile plains afforded food in abundance and an opportunity for the arts to flourish.

Upharsin (p. 126, l. 4) and Peres (l. 7) are forms of the same word: Peres is the singular; Upharsin is the plural with the article attached.

The Destruction of Sennacherib, by Lord Byron (127)

George Noel Gordon, Lord Byron, was born in London, January 22, 1788. In 1809–1811 he traveled in the Mediterranean region and on his return to England published the first two cantos of "Childe Harold"; and, as he said, awoke the next morning to find himself famous. From this time he wrote and published constantly. He was married in 1815 but his wife left him in the following year for some unexplained reason, and Byron abandoned England. The rest of his life was spent mainly in Italy, but in 1823 he joined the Greek revolutionists who were fighting for national independence, and was made commander-in-chief at Missolonghi, where he died of a fever April 19, 1824, barely thirty-six years of age.

Byron's life and character have been much discussed and cannot be wholly commended. Macaulay's "Essay on Byron" is one of the best brief introductions to his work. As a poet Byron's popularity was enormous during his lifetime both in England and on the continent; and his fame is secure. His energy, invention, and emotional force are everywhere manifest, and especially so in the poems written after 1816. For young readers, his narrative poems "Mazeppa," the "Prisoner of Chillon," and the "Siege of Corinth" can be recommended.

III. NORTHERN MYTHS

The preceding groups of selections have given something of two of the great messages from the remote past to the present, that of Greece and Rome, and that of Palestine and the East. We now turn to the dawn of civilization in Northern Europe. It cannot be said that these Northern stories have had a large influence in modern literature comparable with the writings of the Greeks or the Hebrews. On the other hand, these Northern myths, preserved in the literature of remote Iceland, represent the manners, habits, beliefs, and conceptions of life of the peoples who overran all Northern Europe and the British Isles and from whom has directly developed much in our modern civilization.

Resemblances between the Northern gods and those of Greece are many, and are noted in the Helps to Study. But the Northern tales have less highly developed morality than those of the Hebrews and a less refined imagination than those of the Greeks. They are more incongruous, more grotesque, more childish than either; demand less intensive study from the point of view of either literature or morality. The selections in this group offer little difficulty for reading except that due to the strangeness of their material. They are like fairy stories to be read rapidly without too much scrutiny of manners and morals, but they are real and true fairy stories in the sense that they were repeated for centuries by men who believed them. The task of the teacher is (1) to supply the introduction necessary to overcome their strangeness and (2) to emphasize their importance as revealing the thought and imagination of the peoples who have made much of our Europe and America.

The proper names are not numerous or difficult but still require some special attention.

The selections are arranged so that they form an orderly and fairly continuous account of the chief gods and heroes, beginning with the building of Asgard, continuing with the craft of Loki and the exploits of Thor, and ending with the career of Siegfried.

Since all the selections of the group are in prose, it may be desirable to introduce here one or two of the poems that come later in the Reader, as the "Blind Men and the Elephant."

Myths of the Northland (129)

Like the selection "What Are the Greeks to Us?" for the first group, and like the selection "In Bible Lands" (p. 97) for the second group, so this selection gives an introduction and general comment for the third group. This selection should be read with careful attention to content and proper names, and these should be reviewed frequently in the course of reading the succeeding selections.

Sif's Golden Hair and the Making of the Hammer (133)

This story presents Odin, Thor, and Loki in characteristic actions. Its diction is simple and should offer no difficulty for the class. It may be read rapidly and should be sufficient to complete the introduction of the pupils to the chief personages of Asgard.

How Thor Went to the Land of Giants, I, II (145)

This story of giants has many resemblances to the tales of Hercules and Atlas (p. 24) and of Ulysses and Cyclops (p. 62); but here it is the giants who are clever and the venturesome hero who is outwitted. The story is an excellent one; and both its humor and its rapid succession of incidents can be appreciated readily in a rapid reading.

The moral lies deeper. Like the Greek myths, this story celebrates the power of the great forces of Nature against which man struggles bravely but in vain. Fire and the Ocean, Thought and Old Age are the mighty adversaries which conquer the adventurous heroes. These are the real giants of the universe.

The advance of civilization is marked in part by man's increasing power in his never-ending contests with these forces of Nature. This conception can be brought home to the class by many specific instances. Fire is as terrible a devourer to-day as when it contested with Loki, but man has subdued it to his service. It warms our houses, cooks our food, gives the power that runs our mills and railroads. It is the giant that serves us in countless ways and keeps the very life in our bodies. The Ocean is still inexhaustible and overwhelming, but man sends his ships across its surface and through its depths. He has made it a servant to do his bidding and an aid in his progress. Thought is still swift, but man has found ways to assist its flight and enlarge its circuit. The printing press, the telegraph, and now the wireless have hurried Thought across new pathways and into new realms. Old Age still overthrows all men as she overthrew Thor, but man is beginning, through the aid of scientific medicine, to lengthen his years. In spite of the advice of Skrymir to Thor that he had better keep away from the Giants' Home, man has kept on traveling and struggling against whatever opposed him.

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. Thor compared with Hercules. The Character of Loki. How Man has been victorious over Fire. The Ocean Now and in the Time of Thor. How we help Thought in its Travels. The Use of Traveling.

Siegfried the Volsung (160)

Siegfried is the national hero of Germany, as Achilles of Greece, Roland of France, and King Arthur of Britain. All of these heroes belong to legend and their deeds are mingled with wonders and enchantments. They also belong to times when enmities were matters to be settled by the sword. Their stories tell of feud, revenge, and battle to the death.

But amid all this fighting we find the virtues of kindness, generosity, loyalty, and magnanimity.

Siegfried and Brynhild (170)

For a full account of the exploits of Siegfried, read Katherine F. Boult's Heroes of the Norseland, or Emilie K. Baker's Stories from Northern Myths, or James Baldwin's Story of Siegfried. Brown's In the Days of the Giants, and Boyesen's Norseland Tales, and Mabie's Norse Myths may also be recommended to the class.

IV. THE AGE OF CHIVALRY

In the memorable stories and poems that make up this group the remote past yields place to medieval times, which in some conceptions of character and conduct are near our own day. While this group may be studied from at least three points of view, the first is necessarily historical. The pupils should be made to understand that Chivalry was a real and living thing and that it established certain ideals of conduct for many nations. To reënforce the historical aspect of Chivalry the well-known story of Chevalier Bayard, the Knight "sans peur et sans reproche," has been briefly sketched. The pupils should be encouraged to read for themselves this fascinating story in one of the many versions simplified for the young, as that by Christopher Hare. Let the children realize that "without fear and without reproach" has become a common saying all over the civilized world.

One need not stop with Bayard. Innumerable stories from history illustrate the practice of chivalric ideals. Sir Philip Sidney's generous act when he was lying mortally wounded on the battle-field is a famous example. Lanier's Boy's Froissart offers a mine of good stories that may be read in this connection.

But our selections, for the most part, belong to the realm of myth and legend. When the children ask if King Arthur ever lived, let them be told that we do not certainly know, but that stories about him were handed down from father to son in the old, old times. As the word Celtic is used in the Introduction to this group, the class should understand that it not only means the ancient peoples of Great Britain and France, but that it also includes the present-day Irish, the Highland Scots, the Welsh, and many of the French.

The second point of view is moral. The lessons to be learned from the Age of Chivalry are all the more penetrative for being indirect. These are just the lessons that we most desire to see take root in our own new and practical America. They can easily be brought home. Every child can be made to see how right — and perhaps how fine — it is to tell the truth, to keep one's promise, to be brave, to stand up for the right, to protect the younger children from ill-treatment, to be fair in playing games and not to take advantage of one's opponent, to be gentle and courteous in one's manners. The class may be made to feel that the men and women who live up to these ideals make good American citizens. It hardly needs to be added that schools, churches, and other organizations have used the machinery of King Arthur's court by organizing Round Tables, the members of which are bound by promise to maintain some standard of thought, speech, or action. The moral glamour of chivalry, in very truth, still endures, although its outward splendor has passed away.

A third point of view from which this group will be enjoyed is simply as great literature. The stories from Sir Thomas Malory, especially "The Passing of Arthur," are told with such beauty of diction and rhythm that they clothe the subject like a garment, and there is no better illustration of Scott's leisurely, detailed, and convincing manner than the first chapter of The Talisman. The selections from Tennyson are likewise notable. "The Lady of Shalott" ranks very high in his work, and "Sir Galahad" would be famous if only for the two lines that have almost passed into a proverb.

The literature of chivalry, historical and imaginative, in prose and poetry, is very large. The story of King Arthur and his knights, in particular, has never ceased to fascinate writers and readers. Not only Tennyson and Swinburne but also William Morris and Matthew Arnold felt its charm. In the realm of art, Abbey has told us in glowing colors the story of Sir Galahad's life, and Watts's picture of the young knight hangs in many a schoolroom.

The Adventure of Sir Gareth (183)

This selection, somewhat altered by A. J. Church for young readers, is from Le Morte Darthur, the first great story book in English prose. Sir Thomas Malory, an Englishman who lived in the fifteenth century, took the stories from the French and therefore kept the French names, but he made a whole out of his tales, from whatever source, and put them into the most musical English prose that had yet been written. Lanier's Boy's King Arthur, Bulfinch's Age of Chivalry, and Church's Heroes of Chivalry and Romance make Malory available for school children.

After a careful reading of the story of Bayard, the class will come to "The Adventure of Sir Gareth" with some knowledge of the customs of Chivalry. All details of equipment and modes of fighting are important, for they will pave the way for reading Scott and the history of the period. But the first emphasis should be put upon the story. Probably the only difficulty will be in connection with Lynette. The class should not be allowed to forget that to her Gareth is actually only a kitchen boy unfit to rescue her sister from great peril, and that, though she watches him overthrow Sir Kay, she has apparently ridden on too far to see him joust with Sir Lancelot and receive knighthood from him. The lessons of the story will have a special appeal to American children, for Gareth is a prince who wishes to become a knight because of his worth, not because of his rank, and he practices a soldier's obedience in the kitchen, — doing base work and mixing cheerfully with his inferiors. His gay acceptance of good and bad words from the lady he serves is a chivalric trait, as well as his physical and moral courage, his courtesy to his enemies, and his horror of dishonorable knighthood. The great knights of the Round Table, Sir Lancelot and Sir Gawaine, understand his character from the beginning. Sir Kay, loyal though he is to King Arthur, is an inferior knight because he lacks courtesy.

Tennyson's version of the story of Gareth in the Idylls of the King is perhaps too intricate for most children on account of the large amount of allegory, but the more advanced students might enjoy it.

The Lady of Shalott, by Alfred Tennyson (214)

This famous and beautiful poem was written by Lord Tennyson when he was a young man. It tells a story of Celtic magic with almost Celtic beauty. It will introduce to the children the greatest of King Arthur's knights in all his outward splendor and in his gentleness of heart. It gives, besides, a brief picture of wayfaring life in medieval days, and in it, Camelot, the royal city, comes into view. First of all, the exquisite story must be clearly understood. Then the emphasis may be upon the pictures with which the poem is crowded. And, with the teacher's aid, the poem should be read and re-read, not as a task but as a reward and pleasure, until all the class realize that the piece is music as well as story. To their knowledge of Chivalry it adds a detailed account of the equipment of a knight and his horse. If the class wish to know more about Camelot, some of the fine descriptions in Tennyson's " Gareth and Lynette " might be used. As Sir Lancelot does not appear again in our selections, Malory's summary of his character in the last chapter of the last book of Morte Darthur might be read to the class.

The Passing of Arthur, by Sir Thomas Malory (225)

This selection, taken almost unchanged from Malory, shows his style at its best. If it is dramatized, as it might be, care should be taken to keep the very words of the author. For the same reason, the story should be read aloud with as little comment as possible, and care should be taken to preserve the lovely rhythms. Only in this selection is attention centered on King Arthur, and it might be well to find out what the children already know about him. They will enjoy hearing how he received Excalibur, told in Morte Darthur, Book I, chapter 23. The teacher herself will enjoy comparing Tennyson's version of the same story in his " Morte d'Arthur " and noticing how closely he follows Malory. One point in the story may need elucidation — the fact that the knights wore their wealth upon their bodies, not in the form of money, but in the shape of jewels, beads, or brooches. If a lesson is sought for, it may be found in the story believed by the Celtic people of Great Britain that Arthur, the perfect king, would return some day to give them just government, or in the more general truth that the good a man does lives after death. Although king and knights have perished, the memory of their valor and goodness still urges us on to emulate them.

Sir Galahad, by Tennyson (233)

This fine poem by Lord Tennyson introduces a late and non-Celtic theme. The children should not be confused with theories about the Holy Grail. Malory and Tennyson are their best guides, according to whom it is the cup that was used at the Last Supper and that received the blood from Christ's side when he was on the cross. It was taken to Britain, but disappeared from earth when men became very wicked. The knights of the Round Table have undertaken the quest of the Grail as they undertook other adventures. The poem assumes so much information that Malory's account of the Siege Perilous and Sir Galahad, Morte Darthur, Book XIII, chap. 4, might be read by way of introduction. To this might be added Tennyson's lovely description of the holy vessel, put into the mouth of Sir Percival's sister, The Holy Grail, beginning at l. 106, " And, O my brother Percival." This might later be supplemented by Galahad's description of the Grail as it looked to him, beginning at l. 463, and, as a conclusion to the story, what follows should be told or read to the class. The lesson is summed up in the third and fourth lines, but the class will need to be reminded that Sir Galahad has first been a good knight, punishing the wicked and defeating King Arthur's enemies, before he sets out to seek the Holy Grail.

Topics for Oral and Written Compositions. What is meant by Knighthood? King Arthur and his Round Table. Life of Tennyson. The Ideals of Chivalry. A Few Famous Knights.

The Knight and the Saracen, by Sir Walter Scott (237)

This selection may serve as an introduction to the novels of Scott, at least to the more advanced pupils, who should be ready for Quentin Durward, one of Scott's most direct romances. S. R. Crockett's Red Cap Stories simplify Scott for those not ready for the novels themselves.

Chapter 27 of The Talisman may be recommended to the class. It contains the account of the trial of the broadsword wielded by King Richard the Lionhearted and the scimitar wielded by Saladin the Saracen. Chapters 20 and 21 will be interesting to those who wish to know more about the Knight of the Couchant Leopard.

Heroes of chivalry not before mentioned include St. Louis, king of France, who was the last of the crusaders. Chivalry, by F. Warre Cornish, is a valuable book for the teacher. J. H. Robinson has a chapter on the Crusades in his Introduction to the History of Western Europe, which should be in every school library. Guizot's History of France Told to my Grandchildren is full of good stories about our period.

V. OUR COUNTRY (247)

The introduction in the Reader should be read by the class and used as the basis of discussion. The meaning of patriotism can best be defined for boys and girls in the words and deeds of great Americans. The selections have been chosen with a view to a unity of effect. The "Ship of State" makes a vivid picture suggesting the meaning of patriotism. The account of Washington's youth and Jefferson's estimate of his character introduce the father of his country. The struggle for national independence and the birth of the nation are recalled by the address of John Adams and by Emerson's poem on the Concord monument. The great debate on union is represented by the speech of Webster and the poem of Holmes. The ever memorable words of Lincoln celebrate the end of the war and announce the great democratic ideal of our republic. Finally, Kipling's "Recessional" sounds the need of humility amid national exultation.

These selections are naturally grouped together; some are suited for reading on special occasions, as Washington's or Lincoln's birthday. The teacher may find it convenient to read them from time to time, rather than together; but in any case it will be well to call attention to their significance as a group.

The speeches of Adams, Webster, and Lincoln are well suited to recitation. The "Ship of State," the "Concord Hymn," and the "Gettysburg Address" should be committed to memory.

The Ship of State, by Longfellow (249)

Passages from the "Building of the Ship" might be read to the class, so as to give the setting for this final apostrophe to the Ship of State. The passage should be memorized by the class.

It is important for the teacher to realize the part she has in building and guiding the ship of state. The one discipline to which every citizen is subject is that of the school; and the school is the one place where our American national ideals may be taught to all.

The Early Life of Washington, by J. S. C. Abbott (251)

The notes in the Reader give some of the best known Lives, but there is of course a vast amount of biographical matter about Washington. The lesson may afford an opportunity to direct the reading of the class in biography. No books are better suited to boys and girls of the upper grades than clearly written lives of great men and women. Unfortunately the number of biographies well suited to young readers is none too large. JOHN S. C. ABBOTT (1805–1877), the author of this selection, wrote a large number of biographies for boys that have a wide circulation. They are still good reading but they are perhaps proving a little old-fashioned for the youth of to-day.

An interesting series, True Stories of Great Americans, now in process (Macmillan), promises to offer excellent reading about a long list of distinguished men and women.

Whenever the reading lesson permits, a brief talk about the life of some famous man is in order. This might well be accompanied by references to any good biographies available in the local libraries.

The Character of Washington, by Thomas Jefferson (258)

Jefferson writes with care, and his tribute to Washington is especially interesting, for the two men though closely associated were very different in temperament. Jefferson had more of the inventive and penetrative mind in which he finds Washington inferior to Sir Isaac Newton, the discoverer of the law of gravitation, to Lord Bacon, the chief founder of modern experimental science, and to John Locke, the founder of the " sensational " philosophy of which Jefferson himself was a follower. On the other hand, Jefferson pays full tribute to Washington's judgment, prudence, and self-control, qualities in which few men were his equals. Possibly Jefferson underestimates the warmth of Washington's affections.

The selection has been included because of the great interest attaching to the estimate of one great man by another. It offers difficulties in words and phrases and should be read carefully. Each paragraph should be summarized in the class, and the GLOSSARY should be freely consulted.

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. Patriotism. The Builders of the Ship of State. Thomas Jefferson. Washington's Boyhood. My Estimate of the Character of Washington.

The Concord Hymn, by Ralph Waldo Emerson (262)

In connection with this and the following selection, the events that led to our Revolutionary War may be discussed in the class. " Paul Revere's Ride " might be re-read and the circumstances which led to the battle of Concord. In addition to making sure that the historical facts are known by the class, the world-wide importance of the fight at Concord bridge should be emphasized. Nations had defended their independence before this, as in the memorable struggle of Holland against Spain; but for the first time a colony broke free from the mother state and created a nation. Moreover, this nation was created a republic, without king or nobility or state church. The shot was indeed heard round the world; for how many peoples since then have won their independence. Some discussion such as this will prepare the class to realize the full significance of Emerson's Hymn.

Supposed Speech of John Adams (264)

This is an old favorite for declamation, and may be studied in connection with the events leading to the Revolutionary War or with the Declaration of Independence itself.

Liberty and Union, by Daniel Webster (270)

In connection with Webster's great peroration, it will be interesting to read Henry W. Grady's address on the "New South" (1886), which ended with a reaffirmation of Webster's sentiment made forty years earlier. "We should remain united as we have been for sixty years, citizens of the same country, members of the same government, all united now and united forever."

Union and Liberty, by Oliver Wendell Holmes (273)

This selection serves as a supplement to the preceding, and may also be used for declamation. An account of the life of Holmes is given on page 330 of the Reader.

The Address at Gettysburg, by Abraham Lincoln (275)

This immortal address should be committed to memory.

Topics for Oral and Written Composition. The Declaration of Independence. "In union there is strength." Boyhood of Abraham Lincoln.

Good biographies of Lincoln for younger readers are Baldwin's, Scudder's, Hapgood's. See also Miss Tarbell's Father Abraham and He Knew Lincoln, and Mary R. S. Andrews's The Perfect Tribute.

Recessional, by Rudyard Kipling (279)

RUDYARD KIPLING was born of English parents at Bombay, India, in 1865. Few living men have a wider fame. His stories and poems of life in India won him a multitude of readers when he was still in the twenties; and additional books have increased his reputation and multiplied his readers. He lived for some years in the United States, but has now made his home for many years in England. In 1907 he was awarded the Nobel prize for literature.

Among his books best suited to younger readers are: The Jungle Book, The Second Jungle Book, Stalky and Co., Just So Stories for Little Children, Puck of Rook's Hill, and Rewards and Fairies. The class would also enjoy selections from Captains Courageous and Kim.

VI. TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE

This group includes two stories of adventure from fiction and one account of travel from fact. The two stories are from old favorites, Robinson Crusoe and the Arabian Nights, selections from both of which have appeared in earlier Readers. The account of travel is from a book which the pupils should read some day, Dana's Two Years Before the Mast.

Robinson Crusoe and his Man Friday, by Daniel Defoe (281)

In a volume which records the deeds of so many of the heroes of the world's literature — Hercules, Hector, Ulysses, Joseph, Daniel, Thor, Siegfried, Launcelot, and Galahad — a place must certainly be reserved for Robinson Crusoe. Almost every one has at some time wondered, "What should I do if shipwrecked on an unknown island?" Defoe's immortal fiction answers the question. The selection in the Reader tells of one of the great triumphs of Defoe's invention — civilized man encounters the savage, Robinson Crusoe rescues Friday. Millions of boys and girls have read the story before your pupils.

The selection should be easy reading, and most of the class must already have made the acquaintance of Robinson Crusoe in earlier Readers. Possibly you could arrange for a Robinson Crusoe Day, with readings and oral compositions on the chief incidents of the novel. A brief note on Defoe may be found on page 23 of this Manual.

Topics for Oral and Written Compositions. What I like Best in Robinson Crusoe. How he Built his House. His Parrot. What he Brought from the Ship. What Became of Friday.

Robinson Crusoe's Island, by R. H. Dana (289)

This should be read in connection with the preceding selection. It is a good example of straightforward narrative.

Richard Henry Dana (1815–1882) was distinguished as a lawyer and publicist as well as an author. His fame, however, is likely to rest on his Two Years Before the Mast, written as the outcome of a voyage taken for his health in 1834–1836. It is one of the best records we have of the old days of sailing ships.

Other Books of Travel for Boys and Girls. Bullen's Cruise of the Cachalot, Butterworth's Story of Magellan, Ingersoll's Book of the Ocean, Jacob's Story of Geographical Discovery, Schwatka's Children of the Cold, Jenks's Boy's Book of Explorations.

The Story of the Fisherman, from the Arabian Nights (298)

This is from another old favorite, the Arabian Nights. The selection gives the first and one of the most interesting of the one thousand and one tales. The pupils may be called upon to tell the stories which they already know from the Arabian Nights, as those of Sindbad and Aladdin.

VII. POEMS, GRAVE AND GAY

The poems in this section may be read as a group or one at a time.

The questions in the Helps to Study have been framed to ask definite questions only. Many a schoolboy dreads a poem because he cannot give an outline of it as he can of a story or a bit of history. He should not be asked to do so. The thread of the story, however thin, may indeed be stressed. So may the pictures and the lessons, only the teacher should see, in the latter case, that the right lessons are noted. When possible, relate the poems to other poems on similar subjects or by the same author. In connection with "To a Waterfowl" and "The Cloud," recall the poems on birds, flowers, and other outdoor things. Make the bored schoolboy feel that poetry is one form of music and that he will be like a deaf person if he cannot learn to understand it. If a particular poem is really difficult, the teacher will naturally smooth the way, before the class undertake to study it.

Changes of method are especially desirable in the teaching of poetry. Startle the child into attention. One teacher asked her class to select a famous phrase from Browning's "Home Thoughts from Abroad" — a phrase so perfect, she said, that no poet had been able to improve upon it. The next day seventy boys and girls were talking about that phrase as eagerly as if it had been a football game, and seventy minds knew every word of Browning's poem. It is wise to encourage any sign of appreciation, and not to press too hard the wherefore and the why. Give as much credit to the child who reads with attention to meter and rhyme as to the child who can explain the sense. Praise the agreeable voice and show those who have high-pitched voices how to lower and deepen them. The teacher should, of course, give her classes the benefit of her own trained and sympathetic voice by reading aloud passages of special beauty or the whole of a poem. Perhaps, like those who make their living by the use of the voice, she will find it worth while to practice the reading at home.

One unobtrusive way of making children intimate with great poetry is to return to it from time to time, to use it as sight reading without question or comment, to go back to "The Lady of Shalott," let us say, as a reward for some work well done, to give the individual child frequent opportunity to read or recite a favorite stanza. Palgrave's Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics should be upon the teacher's desk, where the class can borrow it during a leisure moment. Macmillan has a twenty-five-cent edition.

A Psalm of Life, by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (308)

This poem, compact of wise sayings, was written in 1838 and soon became popular in many languages. The only way to know it is to commit it to memory and to keep it alive by frequent quotation, either as a whole or in parts. In connection with the last line of the poem, Milton's sonnet on his blindness might be read. Longfellow's "Bridge" may also be used as a pendant to the "Psalm."

To a Waterfowl, by William Cullen Bryant (311)

This beautiful and melodious poem is perhaps the masterpiece of the earliest of our great American poets (1794–1878). It should be read slowly with delicate attention to the punctuation. A rather strong pause at the end of the third line helps to bring out the cadences of the fourth. The class would probably enjoy hearing or reading Bryant's "The Yellow Violet" and his lines "To the Fringed Gentian." In these poems, as well as in the famous "Thanatopsis" and much other verse, Bryant is very happy in suggesting the cool, shy, austere beauties of New England. He was born in a Massachusetts hill town and studied at Williams College nestled among the mountains. In the FIFTH READER, p. 193, there is a note on his long and useful life. The class will recall the poems earlier read, — "The Planting of the Apple Tree," "Robert of Lincoln," and the "Song of Marion's Men."

The Cloud, by Percy Bysshe Shelley (313)

Shelley's short life (1792–1822) was animated by love of beauty and of liberty and by the desire for social reform. All these ideas and many more he put into exquisite lyrics or into narrative poems or into plays. His friendship for Byron finds record there and so does his love of Greek mythology and his intimacy with Italian landscape and life. Many of his best songs are found in Palgrave's Golden Treasury. His "Ode to the Skylark," "The Sensitive Plant," and "To Night" are not too hard for poetry-loving boys and girls, but perhaps the magnificent "Ode to the West Wind" should be reserved till later.

In teaching "The Cloud," one should avoid the easy error of converting it into a lesson in physical geography. The emphasis should be upon its imaginative clothing of natural phenomena. If a lesson is needed, it may be found in the obvious joy with which the cloud does its work — a thoroughly Wordsworthian doctrine. Unless the class have learned to read poetry with their ears, their attention should be strongly directed to the internal rhymes.

The Bells, by Edgar Allan Poe (316)

This poem tells no story. It enumerates and imitates the glad, sad, mad, and bad ringing of bells. It is a night piece and the last stanza reaches a climax of terror in the supernatural. All the bells except those in the first stanza might be church bells. The class will enjoy tracing the rhymes in the intricate stanzas and picking out the imitative words. When the poem is read aloud, some care should be exercised to keep it from degenerating with an orgy of elocution. The class will assuredly enjoy "The Raven," too; and if they are curious about Poe's short stories, they may be advised to read "A Descent into the Maelstrom" or "The Pit and the Pendulum."

The Deacon's Masterpiece, by Oliver Wendell Holmes (324)

This poem should be read first for its story and its humor, but it conveys one obvious lesson — that even humble work beautifully done rises to the level of art and is a joy to its maker.

The exaggerated dialect of the poem may need to be interpreted, and the technical parts of the "shay" should be understood though not too much insisted upon.

The Blind Men and the Elephant, by John G. Saxe (333)

This poem, by an American poet, journalist, and lecturer (1816–1887), is so simple that it might be read without preparation. The lesson is that the blind cannot see aright. It may easily be developed into the moral that we can all have seeing minds if we exercise them enough.

VIII. THE CHILDHOOD OF DAVID COPPERFIELD, BY CHARLES DICKENS (336)

The four selections from David Copperfield are chosen so as to form a continuous narrative of David's childhood. They include the entire history of Barkis's courtship and marriage of Peggotty, and give descriptions of David's home, Mr. Creakle's school, and Mr. Peggotty's house that was a boat. Of the many accounts of childhood in fiction there is none more appealing than that of David Copperfield, and these selections include some of the most pathetic as well as some of the most amusing incidents.

The selections make the longest narrative in the book and introduce the largest number of characters. There is ample chance for expressive and dramatic reading.

Each of the four selections tells a story by itself, and may be treated as a separate lesson. Preliminary drill on the lists For Study with the Glossary will be desirable, and the meaning of each selection cannot be mastered without considerable attention to the vocabulary.

After the selections have been treated separately, they should be read rapidly aloud in the class, so that the entire story may be brought before the class. This will be a good time to discuss the characters and their qualities. If time permits, the teacher may tell more of the story of David Copperfield, or other selections may be read. For example, Chapter III, which tells of David's first visit to the Peggotty house boat; the last part of Chapter XIII, which tells of David's running away and of his arrival at his aunt's, Miss Betsy Trotwood; Chapter XIV, which tells of the discomfiture of the Murdstones and of David's first start in life.

The account of Dickens in the Reader should be made the basis of further discussion in the class. The standard biography of Dickens is by his friend John Forster.

IX. PORTIA'S SUITORS, BY SHAKESPEARE (376)

These scenes from Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice are carefully abridged and arranged so as to present a little play by themselves containing the entire story of Portia and her suitors. The scenes may be taken in the usual manner as reading lessons; and in addition, if time permits, they may be used as a play to be acted by the class. In any case, careful reading should precede the acting.

The Scenes as Literature to be Read. The scenes form a serial story like the "Childhood of David Copperfield." Each scene should be studied and read by itself, and then all the scenes read so that the entire story can be brought before the class. In addition to the usual Helps to Study, special notes on words and phrases have been provided. The text of Shakespeare offers difficulties because of Elizabethan vocabulary and syntax. All such difficulties are explained under the Notes on Words and Phrases for each scene. These Notes should be used as helps to study and reading but not for rigid drill. The pupil should gain from the Notes a full understanding of the selections, but should not be expected to acquire knowledge of Elizabethan usage.

The proper names occurring in each scene are listed in the Helps to Study, with their pronunciation.

The class has had some experience in reading blank verse (" Death of Hector," p. 56) and should be encouraged to give full value to the five accents in each line and to the metrical pauses at the end of the lines.

The content of the scenes gives ample opportunity for class discussion. The story itself is not told by direct narrative but through action and speech, so considerable care is necessary to make sure that all the class understand clearly the circumstances and progress of the action. The persons are presented at important moments in their lives, but disclose themselves only in brief speeches. Yet the master dramatist has made each speech so revealing that we at once form an idea of the speaker's character. What ideas do the pupils form of Portia, of Morocco, of Bassanio, and the others? Are their ideas faulty or vague because of inattention, or because of some not unnatural misunderstanding of the language? Care should be taken that they understand the more striking traits of each of the dramatis personæ.

The story of the caskets may be used as an introduction to the entire play, the Merchant of Venice. The main story may be told and selections from the play read to the class by the teacher. Further, something may be told the class of Shakespeare, of the time when he lived, of the theater for which he wrote, and of the ever increasing admiration with which the world reads his dramas. Any good edition of the play, as that in the Tudor Shakespeare (one volume for each play), will supply the teacher with information. An account of Shakespeare, his time, and his theater will be found in Neilson and Thorndike's The Facts about Shakespeare (Macmillan).

The Scenes as Drama to be Acted. The extent to which " Portia's Suitors " is to be treated as a play must be determined by the teacher. It would seem clear, however, that even while reading the scenes as literature, considerable attention should be given to them as drama. For example, the stage directions should be carefully noted, and passages should be read with regard to the character of the person supposed to be speaking them. An assignment of the parts to different pupils and a dramatic reading would seem necessary in order to bring the full meaning of the scenes to the class. If the assignment of Portia's part is changed with each scene, a fair number of the class can be employed in this reading.

If the teacher wishes to go farther, the suggestions that follow may aid her in arranging for a more complete presentation.

THE STAGE AND THE SCENE. The front of the classroom will answer for a stage. The place is always "a room in Portia's house," and needs no scenery. A chair or two and a table are sufficient furniture. No front curtain is required, and there was none in Shakespeare's theater.

PROPERTIES. The principal properties are: the caskets, the curtain concealing them, and the scrolls and pictures within. The pupils will easily procure something that will serve for these.

ACTING. Such training in acting as will be helpful to the pupil is not very extensive but should involve some of the following important particulars: entering a room, leaving the stage, taking a seat or rising, holding oneself erect, crossing from one side of the stage to the other, standing at ease. In impersonation, the pupils should be encouraged to enter into the characters as fully and freely as possible. Exaggeration of qualities, as Portia's merriment or Arragon's pride, should be preferred to a lukewarm presentation. Niceties of interpretation cannot be expected.

ALL TOGETHER. One of the main purposes of dramatic work in the school is to arouse a common interest. Instead of a lesson which the pupil is to learn for himself, the play supplies a class enterprise in which every one has a concern. The giving of a play is a success or a failure as it arouses or fails to arouse this class unity.

The performance of scenes or plays from Shakespeare may usually be reserved for the upper grades or the high school; but a little experience by younger boys and girls will prove an interesting practice and an excellent introduction to a further acquaintance with Shakespeare's poetry.

Printed in the United States of America.